* "OPINION.—I think that the theory of the statutory enactment must be held to be that a reclaiming note not presented within the reclaiming days or otherwise irregular is no reclaiming note at all. In the same way if such reclaiming note has on presentment been refused as incompetent, that refusal simply ascertains that there has been no valid reclaiming note. I take it therefore that the position is the same as if a reclaiming note had not been presented, or, being presented, had been put aside as a nullity. In other words, Mr Macphail is in the position of having hitherto presented no reclaiming note against my judgment. Therefore having in view the opinions expressed in the case of Steedman, and apparently indorsed in the case of Watt, I see no reason why I should not allow Mr Macphail's client to present a new reclaiming note, leaving it to the Division to deal with it as it thinks fit."

certain churches in the United Presbyterian Church and their successors in these several churches ex officio.

In 1900 the United Free Church was formed by the union of the United Presbyterian Church with a majority of the Free Church.

In a petition for the settlement of a scheme for the administration of the trust, held (1) that the ministers of the churches named by the truster, and since 1900 belonging to the United Free Church, and their successors in office, were entitled to act as trustees; and (2) that the bursaries fell to be awarded to students for the ministry of the United Free Church.

Charitable Trust—Settlement of Scheme—Trustees—Meetings—Voting—Quorum.—A proposed scheme for the administration of a charitable trust, under which there were four ex officio trustees, contained this article,—"At all meetings two of the trustees shall be a quorum. . . . All questions to be determined by a majority of those present. The chairman to have a second or casting vote in addition to his deliberative vote."

The Court sanctioned the article, but altered the word "two" into "a majority," in respect that if the clause were sanctioned as it stood the chairman might do what he liked if only two trustees were present.

Charitable Trust—Settlement of Scheme—Accounts—Audit.—The Court refused to sanction an article in a proposed scheme for the administration of a charitable trust under which the trust accounts were to be audited by the trustees themselves.

Charitable Trust—Settlement of Scheme—Trustees—Powers.—The Court refused to sanction an article in a scheme for the administration of a charitable trust conferring extensive powers of selling, leasing, borrowing, &c., on the ground that the trustees either had the power at common law or must make special application to the Court when circumstances made the exercise of the power necessary.

Charitable Trust—Settlement of Scheme—Bursary.—A truster left the residue of his estate for the endowment of bursaries restricted to students born in the counties of Perth or Kinross. The Court refused to sanction an article in a proposed scheme for the administration of the trust under which the trustees were to be empowered to confer the bursaries on students not born in Perth or Kinross, should there be no applicant who was born in either of these counties.

The truster further provided,—"No student when he gains a bursary shall be entitled to hold it longer than one year, and in order to retain it he must compete and gain it in each year."

The proposed scheme contained an article under which the bursaries were to be tenable for the whole of the student's curriculum, provided that in each year he passed certain of the University examinations for the degree of M.A.

The Court refused to sanction the article.

2D DIVISION.

THIS was a petition for the settlement of an amended scheme for the administration of the endowment held under the holograph deed of settlement (dated 14th March 1869) of the late Rev. James Whyte Mailler, United Presbyterian minister, Huntly, as a trust for bursaries for students in Arts at a University, who were studying for the ministry of the United Presbyterian Church.

The questions raised were (1) as to whether the purpose of the trust had failed in consequence of the United Presbyterian Church having in 1900 been merged in the United Free Church.—See General Assembly of the Free Church v. Lord Overtoun[1]; and (2) as to whether, assuming that the trust had not failed, certain details of the scheme were such as the Court ought to sanction.

The truster, who died on 1st May 1869, by his settlement conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to the trustees therein mentioned. The nomination of trustees was in the following terms:—"I . . . do appoint and constitute the following persons as trustees to carry out the provisions of my will or testament, and I hereby nominate the same, namely, Mr John M'Neill, of William Frew & Sons, Perth; Mr Forrest Frew, of William Frew & Sons, Perth; Mr David Fleming, surgeon, Bridgend, Perth; the Rev. James M'Cowan, minister of North U.P. Church; the Rev. Thomas Miller, minister of South U.P. Church; the Rev. Alexander Henderson, minister of East U.P. Church. The above three clergymen have their charges in Perth, and their successors in their several charges shall be trustees ex officio. Along with the aforesaid I also nominate the Rev. Scott, U.P. minister, Logiealmond; the Rev. William Marshall, D.D., U.P. minister in Coupar-Angus, and clerk of the U.P. Presbytery of Perth, and his successors in said clerkship, shall be a trustee ex officio."

After bequeathing certain legacies, the testator directed:—"After paying off these legacies the trustees above mentioned shall hold all my property for the purpose of founding or forming a bursary, which shall be called the 'Mailler Bursary.' This bursary shall be open to competition only to students studying for the ministry, and the competition shall be restricted to students born in the counties of Perth and Kinross—students residing within these counties, but not born therein, shall have no right to compete. But students born in the counties, although residing elsewhere, shall have a right to compete. No student shall be qualified to compete unless he belong to the United Presbyterian Church, and by the term 'students' I hereby understand and declare that they must be young men studying for the ministry of the United Presbyterian Church."

The settlement further set forth that the available annual sum "may be estimated between £30 and £40. Whatever sum is at the disposal of the trustees, said annual sum of rental clear and free is to be divided into bursaries of £10 each. . . . When the rental can afford four £10 bursaries, one bursary is to be offered for competition to students entering college for the first year; a second is to be offered to students entering college for the second year; a third to those entering the third year; a fourth to those entering the fourth year. When the rental can only afford three bursaries, these shall be offered for competition to students entering college for the first, second, and third years, and one bursary shall be allotted to each year's class of students; if the rental can afford only two bursaries, one of them shall be allotted for competition to the students entering the college for the first year, and the other shall be granted on the same terms to the students entering college for the second year; if the rental can only afford one bursary of £10 it shall be given for competition to the students entering college for the first year. No student when he gains a bursary shall be entitled to hold it longer than one year, and in order to retain it he must compete and gain it each year. The particular time of year when the competition should be held is left to the discretion of the trustees, all minor details regarding the mode and manner of conducting the competition for the bursaries is left to the wisdom of the trustees." The truster then offered a "suggestion" as to the subjects of examination for each year's bursary, which was based on the lines of the ordinary four years' course in Arts usually followed in the Scottish Universities at the date of the deed.

The petition, which was presented on 5th March 1903, set forth: The trustees nominated in the settlement duly accepted office and entered on the management of the trust. The estate consisted of heritable property in Perth and in Milnathort, and £37, 1s. 5d. of moveable estate. In consequence of payment of Government duties and of the legacies left by the testator and of repayment of a sum borrowed in order to put the heritable property into good order, it was not until 1883 that the trustees found themselves in a position to establish the bursaries contemplated by the testator.

"In administering the scheme in accordance with the directions of the testator, the trustees experienced great difficulty in finding candidates for the bursaries, the difficulty being partly due to the smallness of the bursaries in comparison with other bursaries offered by the Church, and partly to the limited area from which students were drawn, while it was latterly also enhanced by a change in the University curriculum from four years to three years with a preliminary examination. In consequence of these difficulties, the trustees found that a considerable surplus income accrued from year to year, which they invested from time to time." The total value of the trust-estate at the date of the petition was £1623, 2s. 1d. "The free revenue for the past year amounted to £67, 6s. 8d., but this revenue cannot be maintained without a considerable sum being spent upon the improvement of the heritable property in Perth, which is very much out of repair.

"On account of the partial failure of the scheme, the trustees have for some time past contemplated approaching the Court for the purpose of getting it amended; but they delayed doing so on account of pending negotiations for the union of the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches. Partly in consequence of that union, and partly by the death or removal of the original trustees from their charges, considerable changes have taken place in the membership of the trust. Of the petitioners two, Mr M'Neill and Mr Frew, were original trustees. Mr Carruthers is the successor of Mr M'Cowan in the North United Presbyterian Church, now the North United Free Church, Perth; Mr Addie is the successor of Mr Miller in the South United Presbyterian Church, now called the Wilson United Free Church, Perth; and Mr Crawford is the successor of Mr Henderson in the East United Presbyterian Church, now the East United Free Church, Perth. The union of the Churches made considerable changes in the constitution of the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Perth. At the date of the union it consisted of twenty-three charges, but by the union seven of these were transferred to other presbyteries, while the remaining sixteen were united with twenty-two charges formerly belonging to the Free Church to form the United Free Church Presbytery of Perth. At the date of the union the clerk of the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Perth was the Rev. John C. Ingles, Crieff United Presbyterian Church, whose charge was transferred to the Presbytery of Auchterarder, and thereafter the petitioner Mr Rainnie was appointed clerk of the United Free Church Presbytery of Perth, and has since acted as a trustee.

"In consequence of these changes it is desirable to have it judicially declared that the trustees, now acting as successors in the charges and offices mentioned by the testator, have the right to do so, and that the bursaries are open to United Free Church students. In any case it is necessary that the scheme of administration laid down by the testator should be amended by adapting it to the new University curriculum, and by providing for the disposal of the trust income in the event of there not being sufficient candidates for bursaries from the limited class specially mentioned by the testator. It is also necessary, in view of the state of the heritable property belonging to the trust, that the trustees should have full power to effect improvements in the same. The trustees have accordingly, after careful consideration, drawn up an amended scheme for the administration of the endowment, which is printed in the appendix hereto."

deleted, and the words in italics being the words added, under the judgment of the Court, infra, p. 337.

The petition was intimated to the Lord Advocate in terms of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, and was served upon James A. Dalmahoy, W.S., Edinburgh, Secretary of the College Committee of the United Free Church, as representing said committee.

The Court remitted the petition to Mr Charles Young, W.S., to inquire and report, and a report by Mr Young was laid before the Court.

A minute was thereafter, on 23d May 1904, lodged on behalf of Margaret Paton Allan and others, who stated that they were the next of kin and heir-at-law of the truster.

The minuters maintained that the purposes of the trust had failed and had become impossible of fulfilment, and that if approval were to be granted to the proposed scheme, it would alter the terms and scope of the bequest, and divert its benefits to purposes and recipients never intended or contemplated by the testator by making the United Free Church the beneficiaries instead of the United Presbyterian Church, to which body the testator belonged, and of which he was a minister.

Argued for the petitioners;—The purposes of the trust had not failed. The United Presbyterian Church had received a large number of new members; it had modified the boundaries of certain of its Presbyteries; and it had changed its name; but none of these changes, nor all combined, altered its substantial identity. The case was a very clear one for the application of the doctrine of cy-près,[1] if indeed it was necessary to appeal to that doctrine. The decision of the House of Lords in the Free Church case[2] had no bearing. There was nothing in that decision to suggest that the United Presbyterian Church had ceased to exist.

The minuters argued that the effect of the union was that the United Presbyterian Church had ceased to exist.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Having considered this petition I have come to the conclusion that there is no good reason why a scheme for the carrying out of the testator's wishes should not be adjusted at the present time. different parts of the Free Church. But the United Presbyterians have not by taking others into union with them and varying their name given up any of their principles or done anything to render the carrying out of this trust impossible in accordance with the desires of the truster. I think, therefore, that the scheme should be considered. That will not, of course, preclude the minuters from taking any action by declarator if they are advised to do so.

LORD YOUNG.—The petitioners are the testamentary trustees of the Rev. James Whyte Mailler, United Presbyterian minister, Huntly, who died on 1st May 1869, and the only purpose of the trust which we need consider is to provide bursaries to students for the ministry of that Church. The prayer of the petition is for judicial sanction of a scheme of administration prepared by the trustees and submitted to us as in their opinion necessary, or at least desirable, in consequence of changes which have taken place since the testator's death.

The chief of these changes, and indeed the only one which I propose to consider, is the union of the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church, effected, or at least enacted and declared by their respective governing bodies, in October 1900.

When the petition was presented on 5th March 1903 that union was, by the judgment of this Court in the case, which for brevity I may refer to as the Church case, held to be legal and valid in all respects, the legal rights, proprietary or beneficial, of the respective Churches as existing prior to the union not being thereby affected, although, of course, and necessarily as we thought, the tenure and administration passed to the governing body of the United Church.

The name given to the United Church was the "United Free Church," and the view of the petitioners (Mailler's trustees) was and is that this Church now comes in place of the United Presbyterian Church, and that the purpose of the trust under Mr Mailler's testament will be legally and properly executed by making such provision as existing circumstances require for awarding bursaries to students for the ministry of the United Free Church. On the other hand, the nearest of kin, including the heir-at-law of the truster, contend in a minute of compearance which they have lodged as respondents to the petition that the United Free Church is not the United Presbyterian Church specified in the truster's testament, and that the truster's estate, now in the hands of the trustees, must as intestate succession be transferred to them.

On 24th May last, when the question between the petitioners and minuters was first argued before us, our judgment in the Church case was under appeal to the House of Lords, and after a brief argument by counsel it was thought expedient to delay consideration of it until the decision of the House of Lords. It was delayed accordingly with the approbation of both parties, it being understood that the parties should have an opportunity of stating further argument if they thought fit. That opportunity was accordingly given on 1st November last (the judgment of the House of Lords having been pronounced), when after some further argument we took time to consider our judgment.

Dec. 21, 1904.
Mailler's Trustees v. Allan.

The question, and the only question, now before us is, whether or not, having regard to the judgment of the House of Lords, and upon a just construction of Mr Mailler's testament, we can hold that the United Free Church and students for its ministry are in the same position as were the United Presbyterian Church and students for its ministry before the union, and on that footing deal with the petition before us.

In dealing with this question we are of course concerned only with the effect, if any, and if so what, of the House of Lords judgment upon the position of the United Presbyterian Church. But there being no suggestion, or room for any, that anything has occurred to affect the position of that Church other than its union with the Free Church, the legality of which was disputed by a few members of the Free Church who in the Church case (as I shall continue to call it) sued for its reduction, it is, I think, impossible to exclude from consideration the effect of the judgment upon the position of the Free Church as it existed before the disputed union in October 1900. This Court when affirming the legality of the union, and therefore refusing reduction of it, necessarily held that it must subsist with respect to both Churches, it being plain that if illegal and invalid with respect to one of them, it must be so with respect to the other also. It is not and never was suggested that there was any other union than of these two Churches made in October 1900. If that union was legal, as we held, the result is that the United Free Church is a legal body, there being no suggestion of illegality in the name. The judgment of the House of Lords must import this result or the reverse, there being no mean between these extremes. If it import this result, that is, the legality and validity of the United Free Church composed of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church lawfully united into one, I see no ground for the contention that the rights of the United Presbyterian Church and the students for its ministry as theretofore existing were thereby extinguished or in any way prejudicially affected.

On the other hand, should we, in respect of the judgment of the House of Lords, or on any other satisfactory ground, hold that the disputed union was illegal—what would be the result? Necessarily that the resolutions for and consequent enactments of such union by the governing bodies of the respective Churches were null and inoperative—as were of course also any enactments by the governing and legislative body of the erroneously supposed to be United Church for carrying it into effect.

The House of Lords certainly in terms reversed the judgment of this Court whereby the legality of the union in question was affirmed, and the demand made for its reduction refused, but I do not read that as a reduction by that House of the union. If so read, the consequence would, as I have pointed out, be that there was no union—the proceedings whereby any union could be effected being reduced as null and void. I say "could be effected," because two Churches can be united only by the Churches themselves—or, of course, by Parliament—an event which has not hitherto occurred.

The minuters (the heirs ab intestato of the testator Mailler) base their claim and consequent opposition to the petition on their averment that in 1900 the United Presbyterian Church went into union with the Free

Dec. 21, 1904. Mailler's Trustees v. Allan.

Church, and is in such union now, the United Church being called the "United Free Church." It is thus, and only thus, that we are in the dispute between the petitioners and minuters, the only parties before us, concerned with the judgment and views of the House of Lords regarding the Free Church. Is that judgment, and are the views of the noble and learned Lords who expressed it, favourable or adverse to that averment of union? The judgment seems to import that in the General Assembly of the Free Church sitting in October 1900 the 650 members of the Assembly who voted for the union thereby—that is to say, by so voting—ceased to be members of the Free Church, and necessarily of the General Assembly thereof. This is probably perplexing to some and even to many, and that whether the union approved of and voted for by these 650 members was legal or not. The judgment seems also to import what may be thought equally perplexing, that all who were members of the Free Church when this vote was given, and who subsequently signified their approval of the union (amounting to hundreds of thousands), thereby ceased to be members of that Church, and so went out of the union if lawful, as clearly perhaps as that they were never in it if it was from the first unlawful, and so never existed. I have thought it my duty to notice this perplexing topic, but do not pursue it further.

I am clearly of opinion that the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church into one was lawful, and was regularly and effectually made without transgressing any statute or rule of the common law which we administer. It follows that in my opinion the United Presbyterian Church now exists as one of the two Churches thus lawfully united and called the United Free Church. At and prior to the death of the testator (Mailler) it (that is, the United Presbyterian Church) existed as a Presbyterian Church formed, as its name distinctly expresses, by the union of several Presbyterian Churches into one. The testator, who was a minister of this United Church, knew this, and when by his testamentary trust he made an enduring provision of bursaries to students for its ministry, I am unable to impute to him the intention that the provision should cease and determine if it ever united with another Presbyterian Church. I am therefore of opinion that the position of the United Presbyterian Church now does not in any material respect differ from its position at and prior to the testator's death in 1869. It is the same Church in all respects, though increased in size as it probably is, and students for the ministry of the United Free Church are I think undoubtedly in the same position, in the sense and meaning of the testament we are construing, as before the union in 1900 students for the ministry of the United Presbyterian Church were or would have been.

Before concluding, I ought, I think, to explain distinctly why I have made no reference to the judgment of the House of Lords in so far as it affects or may affect the proprietary or beneficial trust rights of the Free Church as existing prior to the union, legal or illegal, of October 1900. This Court had by the judgments which the Lords reversed decided that the property held by and vested in the trustees nominated by and on the trust constituted by the Church—that is to say, by its supreme governing body—was the property of the Church, and passed with them into the United Church constituted by their union with the United Presbyterian Church. The House of Lords decided, and I assume rightly, that the Free Church had not in 1900, and indeed never had, any property whatever, that which was vested in their trustees being to the last shilling the property of the beneficent individuals from whom it came, who, and not the Church, were the true trusters of the trustees, who held it not as the trustees of the Church but as theirs.

In the case now before us no such question arises, and so the judgment of the House of Lords in the Church case is not in point. It is not suggested that the property in the hands of the petitioners as Mailler's trustees is or ever was the property of the United Presbyterian Church or of the United Free Church, or that it is administrable otherwise than under the truster's settlement.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the decision of the House of Lords case does not bear on the question we are here to consider. That judgment decided, as I understand it, that as between the two sections of the Free Church, as it existed before 1900, the rights of property went to one section and not to the other. In the case we are dealing with, the trust-estate never was the property of the Free Church, and never was the property of the United Presbyterian Church. Even if it had been the property of the United Presbyterian Church I should still have been of the opinion of which I am now, that the judgment of the House of Lords did not affect that because there has been no change whatever on the United Presbyterian Church except the addition to it of a great many people who have left the Free Church and joined it. But I do not pursue that, because, as I have said, I am of opinion with Lord Young that the House of Lords judgment does not touch the question before us at all.

Mr Mailler left certain funds to be administered by trustees under very specific directions. The trustees, having some doubt as to whether they were the proper persons to carry on the administration of the trust, presented this scheme to us to ask in the first place for our authority to carry it on, and in the second place to enable them by certain alterations on the trust purposes to administer it with more success in carrying out the views of the truster. Now, the first thing I notice is that the only objectors to it are the next of kin and heir-at-law of the truster. I think their claim is altogether untenable. I cannot see any reason whatever for supposing there is any intestacy here; but the judgment we are now to pronounce will not prevent these compearers from pursuing any claim they think they have in a proper action to try that question. The purpose for which Mr Mailler left his money was to enable certain students who were studying for the ministry to qualify themselves as clergy of the United Presbyterian Church. The amount left by the truster is not large, and the bursaries must needs be small; but there is no doubt as to the purpose for which the bursaries are designed and are to be held. I do not think it necessary to go over them in detail, because the observations I have to make on the proposed scheme will shew your Lordships the views I take, so far as necessary to express them, on the trust-deed.

Dec. 21, 1904. Mailler's Trustees v. Allan.

The second head of the proposed scheme sets forth that certain parties shall be the trustees. Now, it is upon that point that the trustees first applied to us. The difficulty they had was this, that the truster named two personal friends as trustees, and several others who may be called ex officio trustees, that is to say, they were not selected in respect of the truster's predilection for them, but because they were incumbents of certain churches there described, all belonging to the United Presbyterian Church in Perth or in that district. These ex officio members who were incumbents of these particular churches thought their trusteeship might be disputed because they were no longer members of the United Presbyterian Church but of the United Free Church. The change in the name to my mind makes no difference whatever in their character. The name may be right or the name may be wrong, but there is no doubt they are the persons indicated by the truster as the persons whom he desired to carry on and administer the trust. They are the incumbents of certain churches well defined, and their successors. I think the present incumbents of these churches (the petitioners), though called ministers of the United Free Church, are in fact ministers of the United Presbyterian Church, and are the persons to whom the truster committed the administration of the trust. Accordingly I think the second article may be approved.

The third article calls for no observation. The fourth does. It is there proposed that "at all meetings two of the trustees shall be a quorum, and that at each meeting the trustees shall appoint a chairman," who should have not only a deliberative vote but also a casting vote. Now, it is obvious that any such provision as that would be an unwise provision, for if only two trustees were present the chairman might do what he liked; I do not think that that is a wise power to put into the hands of any one trustee, and therefore I propose that it be altered, and should read "at all meetings a majority of the trustees shall be a quorum." If the article is altered to that effect, and embracing another alteration which I need not notice, it may be passed.

In article 6 the trustees ask this, that the accounts shall be audited by "the trustees or by any one or more of them to whom the trustees may remit the accounts." I think that again is not a wise provision for the trustees themselves; and accordingly I have struck out these words and leave the article that the accounts shall be audited by "a professional auditor to be appointed by the trustees."

The 7th article I have struck out altogether because it contains powers to the trustees either of a general or special character. In so far as general the trustees have these powers at common law; in so far as they are special powers I think the trustees must apply to the Court for these when the circumstances emerge which render such an application necessary.

The 9th article contains a provision that the trustees shall confer the right to a bursary for the whole period of the student's curriculum. I think that cannot be allowed, because it is in direct opposition to the truster's direction, which says that each bursary shall be held for one year only, though the holder of it may compete for it in the succeeding year. I therefore propose to alter that article so as to give direct effect to what the truster proposes. There is another part of the article I have struck out, namely, that the trustees shall be entitled to award a bursary to a student recommended by the College Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland although he may not have been born in either of the counties named. The truster has provided for students who were born in certain counties only, and I think we have no right to go beyond these.

Mailler's Trustees v. Allan.

Then I think the trustees may competently confer these bursaries on students for the ministry of what is now called the United Free Church. These two Churches (whether they are two or one) are practically one in doctrine and government, and as it was the purpose of the testator to promote the welfare of students who were studying for the United Presbyterian Church, students of the United Free Church may very well be admitted to the benefit.

These are the alterations I propose; and with these I think your Lordships may approve of the scheme.

1st Division. LdStormonth-Darling.

Mr John Findlay M'Culloch, Glasgow, was married to Miss Euphemia Nicol in 1882. By antenuptial contract between the intended spouses, dated 17th March 1882, Mr M'Culloch disponed to Archibald Nicol, Miss Nicol's father, Miss Nicol, and himself, as trustees, inter alia, certain heritable subjects belonging to him in trust "(First) For payment to the said Euphemia Nicol during her lifetime of the free annual income and revenue thereof for her liferent use allenarly; declaring that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds, or the diligence of the creditors, of either of us the said parties hereto: (Second) After the death of the said Euphemia Nicol, for behoof of the child or children of the said intended marriage in fee. . . ." Mr M'Culloch also renounced his jus mariti and right of administration.

Miss Nicol assigned, disponed, and conveyed to the same trustees the whole estate, heritable or moveable, then belonging to her or to which she might acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage (excepting her paraphernalia and the provisions made by Mr M'Culloch in her favour by the marriage-contract) in trust for purposes substantially the same as those above narrated with regard to the property conveyed to the trustees by Mr M'Culloch.

By the marriage-contract power was conferred upon the trustees "to lend or advance (but only if both are surviving and at the joint request of said spouses) to the said John Findlay M'Culloch such portion or portions of said whole estates hereby conveyed as they may think right, and as he may desire."

The trustees accepted office.

By assignation, dated 26th January 1897, Mrs M'Culloch and her husband, in security of a loan of £200, received from John Bunting M'Callum, Glasgow, disponed and assigned to him their and each of their whole right, title, and interest, present and future, whether of liferent or fee, under their antenuptial contract of marriage. The assignation was intimated to the marriage-contract trustees on 30th January 1897.

In January 1904 Mr M'Callum raised an action against the trustees under the marriage-contract, and against Mr and Mrs M'Culloch as individuals, for declarator that the pursuer had acquired right, as from 30th January 1897, to the whole rights of the spouses under the marriage-contract in security of the repayment of the loan, interest, and expenses due under the assignation. Then followed conclusions for payment and count and reckoning.

The marriage-contract trustees lodged defences, and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The assignation condescended on being invalid, and inoperative to transfer to the pursuer the interests of Mr and Mrs M'Culloch under the antenuptial marriage-contract, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the first conclusion of the action.

Six children were born of the marriage, all of whom were alive.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, by interlocutor dated 4th June 1904, assoilzied the compearing defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

* "Opinion.—This case would, in my opinion, be governed by the judgment of the First Division in Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor, 18 R. 615, were it not for one circumstance which creates a distinction. The wife in that case had by antenuptial marriage-contract conveyed her whole estate to trustees, inter alia, for payment to herself of the free income during the subsistence of the marriage, such payment being

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—No question was raised meanwhile as to the fee. The liferent only was claimed by the pursuer. This case was ruled by Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor.[1] The liferent here was not declared alimentary. A provision that a liferent right should not be affectable by debts or deeds was not equivalent to a provision that it should be alimentary.[2] But apart from that, in view of the fact that the spouses were a majority of the trustees, and of the terms of the power to advance to the husband, the provisions in favour of the wife were not effectually protected against her deeds. This was in effect an attempt on the part of the husband to put certain funds beyond the reach of his creditors while retaining full control of them for himself. This the law would not allow. The protection given to the wife must be absolute. If it was not, it was ineffectual. The power to advance to the husband was, in the circumstances, inconsistent with the provimade exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, and her own receipt being declared a sufficient discharge. The wife became a party to a bond and assignation granted by her husband in security of a loan, and she thereby bound herself to the extent of her own separate estate to repay the sum borrowed. In security of her personal obligation she, with her husband's consent, assigned to the lenders her whole right and interest, present and future, under and in virtue of the marriage-contract. In answer to an action by the lenders for declarator that they had acquired right to the whole sums of money payable to the spouses under the marriage-contract, and for payment of the income of the trust-estate until the amount due to the pursuers should be paid off, the wife pleaded that, her estate having been conveyed to trustees for her protection, she could not validly convey away the same stante matrimonio to her own prejudice. But the judgment was that she had power to make, and had made, an effectual assignation of the income of her estate, whether arising during marriage or after its dissolution.

"Here the pursuer's demand is substantially the same as in Halkett's case. On 26th January 1897 he lent to the spouses the sum of £200, in return for which they assigned to him the whole right and interest of each of them, present and future, whether of liferent or fee, under and in virtue of their marriage-contract, which had been entered into on 17th March 1882; and they specially assigned to him their whole interest in the annual rents and proceeds of certain house property in Glasgow which had been put in trust by the husband. It is admitted that no part of the sum lent, or interest thereon, or expenses in connection therewith, has been repaid to the pursuer, and it is said that the sum now due to him amounts to more than double the original loan. The action is directed against the marriage-contract trustees, who are the spouses themselves and the father of the wife, and also against the spouses as individuals. What the pursuer asks is a declarator of his rights under the assignation, and for payment by the trustees of the free annual proceeds of the trust-estate until his debt shall be satisfied. I gather from the record that the trust-estate consists entirely, or mainly, of the house properties specially conveyed by the husband. The marriage-contract also contained a conveyance by the wife of her whole estate then belonging to or afterwards to be acquired by her during the subsistence of the marriage, but the record makes no mention of there being, as yet at least, any property of that description in the hands of the trustees.

"The trust purposes as regards the wife are for payment to her during sion to the wife being alimentary,—that is to say, for subsistence only. There was a repugnancy between the two clauses, and if so, the interests of creditors, and the presumption for freedom of disposal, must prevail.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—A provision in favour of a wife might be protected effectually to such extent as might be intended.[1] The test was whether the trust was for protection or administration merely. There was no authority for the proposition that unless the protection was absolute it was ineffectual. The clause here giving power to advance was not enough to nullify the previous clause as to the wife's liferent not being affectable by debts or deeds. The clause last mentioned expressly provided what was merely implied from a declaration that a right was to be alimentary, and was therefore fully equivalent to such a declaration. Moreover here there had been no advance to the husband under the power. The only her lifetime, for her liferent use allenarly, of the free annual income of the estate conveyed by the husband, and then follows a declaration 'that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds or the diligence of the creditors of either of us the said parties hereto.' There is a similar provision for payment to her of the free annual income of her own estate, with a corresponding declaration that it shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of either of the spouses or the diligence of their creditors; and there is a renunciation by the husband of his jus mariti and right of administration over both the estate coming from the wife and the provisions made by himself in her favour. The contract also contains provisions of fee to the children (of whom there are six), but these provisions are not material to the present question. There is, however, a clause on which counsel for the pursuer laid considerable stress, giving power to the trustees 'to lend or advance (but only if both are surviving, and at the joint request of said spouses) to the said John Findlay M'Culloch such portion or portions of said whole estates hereby conveyed as they may think right, and as he may desire.'

"The decision in Halkett's case proceeded entirely upon the ground that the income of the trust-estate had been placed by the marriage-contract absolutely at the wife's disposal, without any declaration that it should be alimentary or not assignable by her. In this marriage-contract there is no declaration that the income payable to the wife shall be alimentary, but there is a declaration that it is not to be affectable by the debts or deeds or the diligence of the creditors of either herself or her husband, and the question comes to be whether that is not sufficient to take this case out of the rule applied in the case of Halkett's Factor. I think it must be conceded that an alimentary declaration would have had that effect, for the case of Cosens v. Stevenson, 11 Macph. 761, shews that a wife cannot discharge an alimentary annuity secured to her by marriage-contract, even where there is no trust to protect it, her position being distinguishable from that of a wife whose liferent or annuity is not declared alimentary, as in Cowe's case, 4 R. 695. I fail to see why the declaration which we find here should not have the same effect as a declaration that the provision is to be purely alimentary. Even as regards the income of property put in trust by herself, a woman can by marriage-contract make her interest non-assignable, her power to do so being an exception to the general rule that property cannot lawfully be put beyond the reach of the owner's creditors without creating some right, direct or contingent, in a third party. As regards the income of property put in trust by the husband there is still less doubt of the power of the competent mode of obtaining an advance to the husband had not been adopted. What had been done was just what the marriage-contract declared could not be done effectually. A protection to the wife had been effectually given subject to a certain limitation. What had been done did not fall within that limitation. The protection, therefore, prevailed, and the assignation was invalid.

LORD PRESIDENT (read by Lord Adam).—The question in this case is whether the antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between the defenders John Findlay M'Culloch and Mrs Euphemia Nicol or M'Culloch his wife, on 17th March 1882, is effectual to secure the free annual income of the funds and estate settled under it, and in particular, the free annual income of the estate settled by the husband, against the creditors of the spouses, or either of them.—(His Lordship narrated the provisions of the deeds and the facts of the case.)

The pursuer maintains that under the assignation he is now in right of the liferent of the trust funds conveyed by both Mr and Mrs M'Culloch to their marriage-contract trustees, or at all events that he is entitled to have the money arising under that right made over to him in so far as may be necessary to make repayment of the sum advanced by him to the spouses as above mentioned, and it appears to me that he is entitled to prevail in this demand.

The obligation imposed upon the trustees to lend the trust-estate, or any part of it, to Mr M'Culloch without security is, in my judgment, inconsistent with either the wife or children having a secure provision under the contract, and if Mr M'Culloch is entitled to demand and receive such an advance, it seems to me that in a question with the pursuer he is bound, spouses to contract that the interest of the wife shall be inalienable. Where they do so, it seems to me that the declaration must receive effect, and that an attempt by her to assign her interest is one which the trustees cannot recognise. If it be said that such a result is unfair to an onerous assignee who has lent his money on the faith of the wife's deed, the answer must be that, if he had examined the marriage-contract, he would have seen that no deed of hers could affect her liferent stante matrimonio.

"It is suggested on behalf of the pursuer that the clause in the marriage-contract giving power to the trustees, at the joint request of the spouses, to lend or advance any part of the trust-estate to the husband, is a clear indication that the contract was not truly intended to protect either the immediate or eventual liferent of the wife, particularly as the spouses themselves formed a majority of the trustees. The clause is certainly a peculiar one, and I am not aware that anything like it is to be found in any of the cases to which the principle of protection of the wife's interest has been held to apply. I concede that the intention of the marriage-contract is material, and is to be gathered from the whole tenor of the deed. I further agree that the wife's provisions under a deed containing such a clause as this must be allowed to be very precarious. But I do not think that a mere power which has not been, and may never be, exercised can outweigh a positive declaration that the wife's liferent shall not be assignable.

"The result must be to assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions with expenses, but I shall reserve to the pursuer any claims competent to him against the spouses as individuals in respect of their personal obligation under the assignation in his favour referred to in the summons."

or is at all events entitled to use the power to enable him to repay the advance. In this connection it is to be kept in view that the wife bound herself to the extent of her own separate estate to repay the sum borrowed. If the estate is thus left open to a demand for an advance to the spouses, or either of them, it cannot, in my judgment, be said that the rights of the children are indefeasible. It appears that Mr M'Culloch's creditors could directly or indirectly reach the trust-estate as being vested with his rights, including the right to demand an advance. The spouses are a majority of the trustees—the remaining one being Archibald Nicol, the wife's father, and I think that they are thus in a position to demand and receive from the trustees an advance for the purpose of enabling them to pay the debt due to the pursuer. It appears to me that in order to being effectual the protection of a wife's rights under a marriage-contract must be absolute, and that it would be anomalous if marriage-contract funds were in such a position that the wife could reach them but that her creditors could not.

For these reasons, I think that, although the present case is not identical with that of The Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor,[1] and although it is narrow and difficult, the considerations upon which that case was decided are also applicable to this case.

Lord Adam.—On 26th January 1897 the pursuer lent to the defenders Mr and Mrs M'Culloch the sum of £200, and in security of the loan they assigned to the pursuer their whole right, title, and interest, whether of liferent or fee, under an antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between them of date 17th March 1882.

The pursuer claims, in virtue of this assignation, to be now in right of the liferent of the trust funds in the hands of the trustees, conferred on Mrs M'Culloch by that contract, and to have the balance of income in their hands paid to him. As appears from article 7 of the condescendence that is the extent of his present claim.

The question in the case is therefore whether the assignation in question contains a valid assignation of Mrs M'Culloch's liferent of the trust funds in the pursuer's favour.

By the antenuptial contract Mr M'Culloch disponed to Mr Nicol, Mrs M'Culloch's father, and to Mrs M'Culloch and himself, and the survivors or survivor of them as trustees, certain heritable subjects in Glasgow therein described, as also the whole estate and effects to which he might be, or might become, entitled to as heir, or otherwise, of the deceased George M'Culloch, or under or in virtue of George M'Culloch's settlement in favour of his wife.

The purposes of the trust were (first) for payment to his wife during her lifetime of the annual revenue and income of the said subjects for her liferent use allenarly, declaring that the same should not be affectable by the debts or deeds, or the diligence of the creditors, of either of the spouses.

After the death of Mrs M'Culloch the subjects were to be held for behoof of the children of the marriage in fee and divisible among them as therein mentioned. It was further declared that the fee should vest in the children,

[1] 18 R. 615.

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1904.
M'Callum v. M'Culloch's Trustees.

or the issue of predeceasing children, on the dissolution of the marriage. In the event of there being no children of the marriage, the subjects were to be reconveyed to Mr M'Culloch. Mr M'Culloch renounced his jus mariti and right of administration.

Mrs M'Culloch, on the other part, conveyed to the trustees the whole means and estate then belonging to her, or to which she might acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage.

I do not think it necessary to examine in detail the provisions of the contract with regard to this part of the trust-estate. They are substantially the same as those with regard to the portion contributed by Mr M'Culloch —giving a successive liferent to the wife and husband and the fee to the children—and as regards the liferent, declaring it to be for liferent allenarly, and that it should not be affectable by the debts or deeds of the spouses, or either of them, or subject to the diligence of their creditors.

To return, then, to the clause of the contract conferring a liferent of the subjects brought into settlement by Mr M'Culloch, it will be observed that it contains no declaration that the liferent is to be alimentary, but only that it is to be in liferent allenarly and not to be subject to the debts or deeds of the spouses or the diligence of their creditors. Now, had there been no peculiarities in this deed, I should probably have concurred with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the liferent, though not declared to be alimentary, should be so considered.

But the first peculiarity in this deed is that the trustees are the two spouses themselves and the father of the wife. The result is that the two spouses alone, if they happen to be the survivors, and, in any event, as the majority of the trustees, are in a position to exercise all the powers conferred on the trustees by the deed. Now, the deed contains this power—"With power also to the said trustees to lend or advance (but only if both are surviving, and at the joint request of said spouses) to the said John Findlay M'Culloch such portion or portions of said whole estates as they may think right and as he may desire." No doubt the power is only to advance such portions as the trustees may think right, but, for the reasons I have stated that appears to me, in this case, to mean just what the spouses themselves think right. I see nothing, accordingly, in this deed to prevent Mrs M'Culloch lending or advancing, or consenting to lend or advance, the trust funds to her husband, and so it might be, and probably would be, putting an end to the fund from which her liferent was derived.

It may be that, if the trustees had been entirely independent, the fact that their consent was necessary to an advance might have afforded the wife some protection against her own acts. But I do not think that was the intention of the parties to this contract, and I think that was the reason why the liferent was not declared to be alimentary, which would have had that effect. I think the intention was that the husband should have the use of the trust funds during the joint lives of the spouses, but at the same time that they should not be open to the diligence of his creditors. But that the law will not permit,—neither do I see how a liferent can be considered as alimentary when the liferenter has power to alienate or consent to the alienation of the fund from which it is derived.

So far as appears, the trust funds in this case are entirely heritable.

No. 59.
Dec. 22, 1904.
M'Callum v. M'Culloch's Trustees.

Had the trustees, that is in effect the spouses, had money in hand, no doubt the loan or advance would have been made direct to the husband, but the subjects being heritable, it was more convenient for the spouses to borrow the money and to assign their interest in the trust-estate in security. But the result as regards the trust-estate is the same in either case, as, if the assignation is valid, it will now be applied in so far as necessary in extinction of the loan made to the husband. In the one case the loan would have been made directly to the husband, in the other indirectly.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the liferent in question is not alimentary, but is assignable and has been validly assigned.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in Lord Adam's opinion. I may add that in my opinion it is essential to the constitution of an effectual marriage-contract trust that at least one of the trustees should be a neutral person.

A trust in which the spouses are the sole trustees gives no protection to the beneficiaries against the voluntary acts of the spouses, and therefore would not be effectual against creditors.

There may be cases in which there were originally other trustees, but where owing to the death or resignation of some of the original trustees, the spouses have come to be the sole continuing trustees. In such a case the spouses may assume a new trustee if they wish that the destination should be protected, but nothing of the kind was done in this case.

But here the trust is in its inception a trust in which the spouses, being a majority of the trustees, are virtually the acting trustees having the control of the trust funds, with a power to advance capital without restriction, and such a marriage-contract trust cannot in my opinion be regarded as effectual against creditors. It follows that the pursuer is entitled to have the obligations of the spouses made effectual.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam upon the grounds stated by him. I wish to add only that I think the point is settled by authority. I assume that the Lord Ordinary is right when he says that the declaration in this marriage-contract, that the income is not to be affectable by the debts or deeds or the diligence of the creditors of the wife herself or her husband, has the same effect as if the income had been declared to be alimentary. I assume this to be correct for the purpose of the argument, but, on that assumption, I hold the law to be that no one can settle property in such a way as to give himself the full beneficial enjoyment of it, and at the same time to protect it against his creditors. That is settled by the case of White's Trustees v. Whyte.[1] In that case it was proposed to wind up a trust where all the trust purposes had been fulfilled except payment of an annuity which was declared by the trust-settlement to be an alimentary provision and not arrestable nor assignable by the annuitant. For the purpose of winding-up the trust, it was proposed that the trust property should be made over to the truster's heir and residuary legatee on condition of his granting a bond of annuity over the heritable property which formed the residue of the trust-estate, in favour of the annuitant, in precisely the same terms as provided in the trust-deed. It was held that this was perfectly incompetent, and the reason given in the Lord President's opinion is decisive of this case. The Lord President says:—"No man can tie up his own property so as to exclude the diligence of his own creditors, and I do not think that anybody by a mere conveyance to an individual can exempt that individual from the diligence of his creditors as regards the property conveyed. But if a settler desires to provide an alimentary payment to some person in whom he has a want of confidence . . . and desires to make a provision which the party recipient shall not have the power to discharge or assign, or give up in any way, he may do this:—he may place a sum of money in the hands of trustees, and may direct them to use that money in such a way that without a breach of trust they could not possibly listen either to an assignee or an arresting creditor, because the directions of the truster would be . . . 'You shall pay over term by term a certain sum of money to the beneficiary whom I have named; you shall not pay it to anybody else. The trust is created for the purpose of the money getting into her hands, and I forbid and restrain you from doing anything else with it.' I apprehend a truster can do that. This has been recognised for a long time as an effectual way of creating such a restrictive alimentary right, and I know of no other way in which it has ever been supposed that it can be done." I think this is conclusive of the whole matter. It is obvious that a restraint imposed upon trustees must be futile if the beneficiary can relieve the trustees of the restriction at pleasure, and require the trust fund to be made over to himself or his assignees. The attempt to protect the funds against the deeds of the beneficiary or her husband here was I think quite ineffectual. For this and the other reasons expressed by your Lordships I concur in the judgment proposed.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against; found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Widows' Fund in 1870, was struck off the roll of the Faculty in respect of his having been convicted of a crime, and subsequently the Widows' Fund Society declined to receive his contributions.

In an action brought by C. and his wife and children against the Widows' Fund Society, held that as C. was no longer a member of the Faculty of Procurators he was not entitled to contribute to the Widows' Fund, and that at his death his widow and children would have no right to the benefit of the fund, diss. Lord M'Laren, who was of opinion that while it was a condition of a person being admitted as a member of the Widows' Fund that he should be a member of the Faculty of Procurators, it was not a condition of the contract of insurance that he should continue to be a member of that Faculty during his life.

1st Division. Lord Low.

THE FACULTY OF PROCURATORS IN GLASGOW was erected into a corporation and body politic by royal charter, dated 6th June 1796, and the Faculty obtained a supplemental charter dated 20th August 1897. By the royal charter of 1796 the members of the Faculty were granted the exclusive privilege of practising as law-agents in the Sheriff Courts in Glasgow.

Prior to 1833 the Faculty gave aid, and, under a scheme which it had established, granted annuities to widows and children of members of the Faculty.

In 1833 an Act of Parliament * was passed for the more effectual management of the fund, and it was declared by that Act that all and each of the members of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow who were members of or contributors to the fund, and every other person or persons who should thereafter become members of or contributors to the said fund in manner thereinafter mentioned, should be members and contributors to the fund established under the provisions of the Act, and should be called "The Society of Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow." The Society was also incorporated by the Act.

Under the Act only members of the Faculty were eligible for admission to the Widows' Fund Society, and all who became members of the Faculty, and who were under fifty years of age, were required to become members of and contributors to the Society.

The Law-Agents Act, 1873,† abolished the exclusive privileges previously enjoyed by the Faculty, and in consequence it was seen that there would be no adequate inducement to Glasgow law-agents to become members of the Faculty, and that the Widows' Fund could not continue to be maintained on the same footing as before. New regulations for the fund were accordingly made by The Glasgow Faculty of Procurators' Widows' Fund Act, 1875.‡

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

On 28th February 1870 James Colquhoun became a member of the Faculty and a contributor to the Widows' Fund. He duly paid the entry-money to the Widows' Fund, amounting to £65, and his marriage-tax, amounting to £12, 10s. He also paid his half-yearly contributions of £1, 15s. each from the year 1870 till Candlemas 1899.

On 4th October 1899 James Colquhoun pleaded guilty to a charge of embezzlement, and was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

On 2d March 1900, at a meeting of the Faculty of Procurators, James Colquhoun's name, in consequence of his conviction and sentence, was struck off the roll of the Faculty.* Thereafter, on the application of the Faculty of Procurators Colquhoun's name was struck off the rolls of law-agents and notaries-public by the Court of Session.

In July 1903 James Colquhoun wrote to the treasurer of the Widows' Fund inquiring the amount of the arrears of contributions due by him, and stating that he was prepared to pay the amount of the arrears, with interest thereon. In reply to this letter Mr Arthur Forbes, the treasurer of the Widows' Fund Society, wrote to Colquhoun stating that at a meeting of the Widows' Fund Society held on 4th February 1901, he had been instructed to decline to accept payment of any contributions tendered by him, and to strike his name off the list of contributors.

After further correspondence the following excerpt from the minute of meeting of the Widows' Fund Society, held on 4th February 1901, was sent to Colquhoun:—"It was reported that Mr Colquhoun had been convicted of a crime and sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and his name had been struck off the roll of the Faculty on the 2d day of March 1900, and from that day he ceased to be a member of Faculty or to have any interest therein, and that thereafter, upon the petition of the Faculty, his name had been struck off the rolls of law-agents and notaries-public by the Court of Session. The half-yearly subscriptions to the Widows' Fund due by Mr Colquhoun upon the 2d of February 1901 had not been paid. The treasurer asked for instructions as to how he was to deal with the case in the event of a subscription being tendered in future. The meeting was of opinion that Mr Colquhoun had ceased to be a contributor to the Widows' Fund or to have any interest therein, and instructed the treasurer to decline to accept payment of any contribution tendered by or on behalf of Mr Colquhoun, and to strike his name off the roll of contributors."

On 22d January 1904 James Colquhoun, his wife, and children raised an action against the Society of Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, and David Murray, LL.D., writer, Glasgow, and others, the trustees of the Society, con-persons who shall then be contributors and shall not have renounced or forfeited their interest as aforesaid, shall have any interest in the fund."

The Glasgow Faculty of Procurators' Widows' Fund Act, 1833 (3 Will. IV. c. lxiv.), enacts, section 25, that every person who shall lodge a certificate or produce evidence on the subject of his wife's age knowing the same to be false, "shall ipso facto forfeit all right and interest in said Society for himself and his widow and children."

Section 26 provides for a similar forfeiture in the event of a member's annual contributions being five years in arrear.

* By the supplementary charter obtained by the Faculty of Procurators, dated 20th August 1897, it was provided (section 3) that the Faculty should have power to remove any member's name from the roll.

cluding (1) for reduction of the minute or resolution of the Society dated 4th February 1901, whereby it was resolved that James Colquhoun had ceased to be a contributor to the Widows' Fund, or to have any interest therein; and whereby it was also resolved to strike his name off the list of contributors; and (2) for declarator that, notwithstanding the passing of said minute or resolution, James Colquhoun was, at the date thereof, and still is, a contributor to the Widows' Fund, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits of a contributor, and that his wife and children were, notwithstanding the said resolution, still entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits of the widow and children of a contributor to said Widows' Fund.

The pursuers in their condescendence narrated the facts above set forth, and averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 10) "In the original charter of 6th June 1796, the Faculty had no power to remove any member for unprofessional conduct, but, by the supplementary charter of 20th August 1897, it was provided (section 3) that the Faculty should have power to remove any member's name from the roll."

To this averment the defenders replied:—(Ans. 10) "The charters mentioned are referred to. Explained that section 3 of the charter of 1897 confirmed and recognised a power, which the said Faculty had previously exercised, of removing any member for unprofessional conduct from the roll. Quoad ultra not admitted."

(Cond. 14) "The said resolution of 4th February 1901 was ultra vires of the Society. From the date of the Act of 1875 the defenders' Society was really an annuity or insurance company in liquidation, and no action on the part of the Faculty of Procurators, which, after the passing of the Law-Agents Act of 1873, and more particularly after obtaining the supplementary charter of 20th August 1897, had ceased to have any real connection with the Widows' Fund Society, could entitle the said Society to remove a contributor from the roll on the plea that he was no longer a member of Faculty, the Faculty being, to the extent of three-fourths of its membership, composed of persons who were not contributors to the fund administered by the defenders' Society."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—2. The said minute or resolution falls to be reduced in respect—(1st) that it was ultra vires of the defenders, null and void, and illegal; and (2d) that no notice that said resolution was to be considered was given to the pursuer, James Colquhoun. 3. The pursuers are entitled to declarator, as concluded for, in respect that the said James Colquhoun has not incurred forfeiture of his interests in the defenders' Society, and is still legally a contributor thereto. 4. The pursuer, James Colquhoun, not having been legally and validly expelled from the defenders' Society, is still a contributor thereto, and is entitled to decree of declarator to that effect.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—2. The said minute or resolution being within the powers of the defenders, and legal and valid, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied. 3. The only persons entitled to receive benefit from the funds of the Society being the widows and children of members of the said Faculty of Procurators, and the said James Colquhoun being no longer a member of the said Faculty, and it not being possible for the other pursuers ever to be the widow and children of a member of said Faculty, the pursuers have no interest in the said society or the funds thereof.

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

On 25th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) dismissed the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—Mr Colquhoun was admitted to the Widows' Fund under the provisions of the Act of 1833,[1] and there was no provision in that Act which made it an essential condition of the contract that he should remain a member of the Faculty of Procurators during the whole of his life. On the contrary, sections 25 and 26 of the Act specially provided that a contributor should forfeit his rights in certain events, and no other forfeiture, such as was here suggested, could be implied. Section 3 of the Act of 1875[2] secured the benefit of the fund to the persons who were contributors at that date, and their widows and children. The supplementary charter which had been obtained after Mr Colquhoun became a contributor to the Widows' Fund, and which alone gave the Faculty of Procurators the power of expulsion, did not interfere with the rights of contributors to the Widows' Fund.

Argued for the defenders;—A contributor to the Widows' Fund must be a member of the Faculty of Procurators, and this condition applied not only at the time of joining the Widows' Fund but so long as he desired to remain a contributor. This was clear from the preamble

* "OPINION.—I think that under the Widows' Fund Act of 1833 it is plain—(1) That no one could be a contributor to the Widows' Fund unless he was a member of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow; and (2) that no persons were entitled to the benefit of the fund except the widow or children of a contributor. When the name of the pursuer, James Colquhoun, was struck off the roll of the Faculty, he lost the necessary qualification of a contributor, and had no longer a right to contribute to the fund, and therefore at his death his widow and children will, if their rights are to be determined by the Act of 1833, not be among the class of persons who alone are entitled to the benefit of the fund.

"It was argued, however, that the position of matters was materially changed by the amending Act which was passed in 1875, and that the effect of that Act was to secure the benefit of the fund to the widow or children of all persons who at the passing of the Act were contributors.

"That argument was founded chiefly upon the provisions of the 3d section of the Act of 1875. The reason why that Act was passed was that certain exclusive privileges of the Faculty of Procurators had been taken away by Act of Parliament, and it was therefore considered to be expedient to repeal the provision of the Act of 1833 that all persons becoming members of the Faculty should be contributors to the Widows' Fund. The 3rd section therefore repealed that provision, and enacted that after the date of the Act no person should 'be obliged or entitled to be' a contributor to the fund, and that 'no person other than the widows and children of then deceased contributors . . . and the persons who shall then be contributors . . . shall have any interest in the fund.'

"It seems to me that enactment does not support the pursuers' contention. What the section provided was that no person who was not a contributor at the passing of the Act should have an interest in the fund, but it did not provide that every person who was then a contributor should have an interest in the fund.

"It therefore seems to me that the Act of 1875 does not alter the condition that, unless a person is at the time of his death a contributor to the fund, his widow and children have no claim to participate in the profits thereof.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to decree."

of the Act of 1833, and from an examination of its clauses. The Faculty of Procurators had power to expel members who had misconducted themselves before the power was in terms conferred by the supplemental charter of 1897, but in any case Mr Colquhoun must be held as having acquiesced in the provisions of the new charter. The Act of 1875 gave no indefeasible right to the contributors, and made no alteration on the condition which required a contributor to be a member of the Faculty.

LORD PRESIDENT (read by Lord Adam).—(After narrating the facts set forth supra and the proceedings taken to remove Mr Colquhoun's name from the roll of contributors)—The pursuers maintain that the proceedings thus taken by the Society were ultra vires, that from the date of the Act of 1875 the defenders' Society was really an annuity or insurance company in liquidation, and that no action on the part of the company in liquidation, or of the Faculty of Procurators, after the passing of the Law-Agents Act, 1873, and more particularly after the granting of the supplementary charter of 20th August 1897, as it had ceased to have any real connection with the Widows' Fund Society, could entitle the Society to remove a member from the roll on the plea that he was no longer a member of the Faculty, which it is stated is to the extent of three-fourths of its membership composed of persons who were not and are not contributors to the funds administered by the defenders' Society.

The defenders having been called upon to accept payment of the arrears of contributions which became due by the pursuer, James Colquhoun, and having declined to do so on the ground that he had either ceased to be a contributor to, or had been expelled from, the Society on 4th February 1901, the pursuers seek to have what they maintain to be their rights affirmed in this action.

I am, however, of opinion that the contention of the defenders is right, and that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be adhered to.

It appears to me that the condition of a person being entitled to contribute to the Widows' Fund has throughout been, and now is, that he is at the time a member of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, and that no persons were or are entitled to the benefit of the fund except the widows and children of contributors. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that when James Colquhoun was struck off the roll of the Faculty he lost the necessary qualification for being allowed to be a contributor, so that he had no longer right to contribute to the fund, and that consequently at his death, his widow and children will, if their rights then depend upon the Act of 1833, not belong to the class of persons who are alone entitled to the benefits of the fund.

It was maintained on the part of the pursuers that the effect of the amending Act of 1875 was to secure the benefits of the fund to the widow and children of all persons who, at the passing of that Act, were contributors, whether they did or did not continue thereafter to be members of the Faculty. In support of this contention the pursuers relied chiefly upon section 3 of the Act of 1875, which, we were told, was passed because, certain exclusive privileges of the Faculty having been taken away by Act of Parliament, it was deemed expedient to repeal the requirement of the Act of 1833, that all members of the Faculty should be contributors to the Widows' Fund. I concur with the Lord Ordinary, however, in thinking that this argument of the pursuers is not well founded. The section in question contains a negative proposition that no person who is not a contributor to the fund should have any interest in it, but it does not declare affirmatively that every person who was then a contributor shall have an interest in the fund.

I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the Act of 1875 does not alter the condition that unless a person is at the time of his death a contributor to the fund, his widow and children have no claim to participate in the benefits of it.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with his Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—After giving my best attention to this case, I find I am unable to concur in the opinion that has been read, but my opinion will not affect, as I understand, the judgment of the Court, and I shall only indicate the general grounds of it.

My view is that it was a condition of membership of this Widows' Fund that an insurer should, at the time of his insurance, be a member of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow, but I can find no evidence that it was a condition of membership of the Widows' Fund that a party should continue to the end of his natural life to be a member of that Faculty. On the contrary, it appears to me to be reasonably clear that if a member chose to resign his position as a member of the Faculty, he would not thereby forfeit the benefit of the insurance he had effected in order to make a provision for his family. I need hardly say that, when I speak of resignation, I am not putting an imaginary case, because it may well be that a member of the Faculty of Procurators might desire to join some other legal Faculty, such as the Bars of England, Scotland, or Ireland, and could only do so, in accordance with the rules of these higher branches of the profession, by severing his connection with this body of solicitors. In such a case I think it would be inequitable that a party who had contributed to the fund for a series of years should forfeit the benefit resulting from his contract with the Widows' Fund. Of course if it were a term of the contract that he should lose the benefit of the fund on leaving the Society, cadit quæstio, but I see no evidence, either in the charters or in the Act of Parliament establishing the Widows' Fund, that it was ever made a condition of membership of the fund that the member should continue a procurator.

Now, the way in which Mr Colquhoun's connection was severed was that he was expelled by the Faculty from their body as a consequence of a conviction for fraud. Nobody suggests that his expulsion was not a proper exercise of the powers of the Faculty of Procurators. Whether it involved the forfeiture of his rights in the Widows' Fund is, as I have endeavoured to state, a different question.

The Faculty defend their action upon their common law right to maintain the purity and integrity of their body, and also upon the terms of their supplemental charter. I do not doubt that the Faculty have power to expel a fraudulent member from their body independently of any express power in their original charter. The granting of the exclusive privilege to a body of solicitors to practise in the Courts of Lanarkshire necessarily implied a moral fitness to practise, and would justify the exclusion of anyone convicted of a crime against property, such as fraud. I do not think it necessary to consider what are the powers of the Crown in regard to a clause of pecuniary forfeiture in a charter. In general, the Crown could neither levy a tax nor impose a penalty without the authority of Parliament, but when a penalty or forfeiture is introduced into a charter, the validity of the condition, and the legality of its exercise, do not depend upon the powers of the Crown but upon agreement, because those who applied for the charter, and those who subsequently applied for membership of the society, must be taken as assenting to all the conditions of the charter. If, as I think, it is an implied condition that a member shall have the qualification of honesty for the discharge of his duties, he cannot complain of being expelled when convicted of fraud. If the charter or the Act establishing the Widows' Fund had provided that the benefit of the fund should be lost through expulsion, I should admit that anyone joining the body accepts membership on this condition. There is no such condition in writing, and I have been unable to discover any legal grounds on which the Faculty of Procurators, when expelling a member, should also impose on him the penalty of being deprived of the benefits of a contract of insurance for which he has paid. No private corporation has the right to impose penalties on its members, apart from their consent, and it seems to me that this contract right, being once established, must continue until it is voluntarily relinquished, or is dissolved by the breach of some condition on the part of the assured.

No. 60.

Dec. 22, 1904. Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

But then it is said that the action of the Faculty is supported by the supplemental charter. I observe that the supplemental charter was obtained long after Mr Colquhoun became a member of the Faculty of Procurators. If it had been proposed in the application for the charter that anyone who was so excluded from the Society should forfeit his right to the pension fund, it would have been in the power of any member of the Society to make a representation to the Crown against the granting of the power, and according to practice that representation would have been remitted to a committee of the Privy Council to be heard on its merits. I am not surprised that no member of the Faculty should have represented against the supplemental charter, because it merely gives the power of expulsion which I think the Society already possessed, and which it was proper that they should have in express terms. The application for the charter was in terms of the charter itself and gave no notice to anybody that it was intended to interfere with pecuniary rights under the Widows' Fund. Nor was it likely to occur to anyone that this could be intended, because, as a matter of fact, a large number of members of the Faculty at that time were not contributors to the fund.

That being so, in my opinion the supplemental charter does not advance the question. I think it leaves the powers of the Faculty exactly where they were, the power of expulsion being for the purpose of discipline only, and for the carrying out of the fundamental object of the charter, viz., the establishment of a Society whose members are intellectually and morally qualified to assist in the conduct of the business of the Sheriff Court. No. 60.

Dec. 22, 1904. Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

For these reasons, my opinion is that Mr Colquhoun, notwithstanding his having justly incurred the censure of the Faculty, and having been justly expelled from the Faculty, is entitled to make payment of the premiums in order to secure for his family the benefits which the Widows' Fund was intended to provide to all its subscribers.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord President, which I have read.

Trust—Administration—Personal Liability of Trustees—Rebuilding Heritable Property—No express power to rebuild—Investment of Trust-Funds—Duty of trustees towards liferenter and fiar respectively.—Circumstances in which held that trustees who had expended trust funds in rebuilding and improving heritable subjects belonging to the estate, which twenty-one years after the rebuilding realised £100 less than the sum expended upon them, had not acted imprudently or negligently, and that loss had not been caused by their fault.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action of count, reckoning, and payment at the instance of Ann Henderson Armstrong and others, beneficiaries under the trust-disposition of the late Walter Wilson, baker in Hawick, against (1) Walter Wilson's testamentary trustees; (2) the testamentary trustees of Elizabeth Wilson, Hawick; and (3) the whole beneficiaries, other than the pursuers, under Walter Wilson's settlement.

By his trust-disposition and settlement Walter Wilson, who died on 6th July 1878, had conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his sister, Elizabeth Wilson, and others as trustees for the trust purposes therein mentioned. He directed his trustees, inter alia, (3) to make over his household furniture and personal effects to Elizabeth Wilson, and to pay her a legacy of £600; (4) in the event of Elizabeth Wilson being unmarried at his death (as she was) to pay to her or to permit her during her life, so long as she remained unmarried, to uplift the rents, interests, and profits of the whole residue of the estate, declaring that if she married (which she never did) her liferent should be restricted to the rents of the heritable part of the estate; and (5) as the residue of the estate should be freed from Elizabeth Wilson's liferent interest therein (which event occurred upon her death in 1901) to divide it into thirteen equal shares to be held, paid, and applied as specified in the settlement, and, inter alia, after the death of the survivor of Jane Wilson or Armstrong, the testator's sister and her husband (an event which had occurred), for payment equally of four of these thirteen shares to her children therein mentioned nominatim, among whom were the pursuers. Power was conferred on the trustees to borrow money for the purposes of the trust; to sell all or any part of the trust-estate; and to invest the trust funds, inter alia, in the purchase of heritable property.

Defences in the present action were lodged for the defenders, Walter Wilson's trustees, and the defenders, Elizabeth Wilson's trustees.

Accounts were lodged by Walter Wilson's trustees. These accounts disclosed that these trustees shortly after the death of Walter Wilson had expended the whole residue of the moveable estate left by him, amounting to £625, and also a sum of £597 borrowed from Elizabeth Wilson, the liferentrix, on a bond and disposition in security bearing interest only after her death, upon rebuilding a house and bakery at No. 10 Howegate, Hawick, in which the testator had lived and carried on his business, and in which after the rebuilding the liferentrix and her successors also carried on business as bakers. The trustees had also subsequently acknowledged the liability of the trust, and had granted promissory-notes for the cost of certain alterations and improvements made upon the same premises at the expense of the liferentrix, amounting in all to £276, 2s. 7d. The sums in the bond and promissory-notes had been repaid to the liferentrix's representatives after her death in 1901, but with interest only from the date of her death. Upon the sale of the subjects, No. 10 Howegate, in 1901 the price realised was £1400, being about £100 less than the sum expended on them out of capital since the testator's death. It further appeared that the gross moveable estate, as shewn in the accounts as at the date of death, was £1939, and the free residue, after payment of expenses, debts, and legacies, £625, as above mentioned. The deceased left three heritable properties, viz., Nos. 8 and 10 Howegate and No. 7 Buccleuch Street, all in Hawick. The saleable values of these properties entered in the succession-duty account, given up for the liferentrix in 1878, were respectively:—No. 8 Howegate, £1150; No. 10 Howegate (the property rebuilt), £500; and No. 7 Buccleuch Street, £700. These amounts were in each case about fifteen years' purchase of the rental at that time. These properties ultimately in 1901 realised—No. 8 Howegate, £530; No. 10 Howegate, £1400; and No. 7 Buccleuch Street, £600.

The sum brought out as the balance available for division under the fifth purpose of the settlement after realisation of the whole trust-estate was £1514.

The pursuers lodged objections to the trustees' accounts, in which they maintained (1) that the trustees had no power to expend the trust-funds in rebuilding; (2) that the rebuilding was a speculation which had resulted in loss; (3) that it was undertaken at the request and for the advantage of the liferentrix, and in disregard of the interest of the ultimate beneficiaries; and (4) that the loss to the trust-estate resulting from the original rebuilding and subsequent expenditure in improving and extending the buildings as rebuilt amounted to about £1000, for which the defenders were responsible.

The trustees in answer maintained that the rebuilding and subsequent expenditure were necessary and expedient, and had not caused loss to the trust-estate.

After sundry procedure the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 30th December 1903, before further answer, allowed both parties a proof of their averments on record, and in the minutes of objections to the accounts and answers thereto.

Proof was led accordingly. The facts established sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord President, infra.

On 30th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the proof, productions, and whole cause, finds that it has not been proved that in the management of the trust-estate of the late Walter Wilson, baker, Hawick, the trustees acted imprudently, negligently, or unfairly, or that loss to the estate has been caused by their fault: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of count and reckoning brought against the trustees of Walter Wilson, baker, Hawick, who died on 6th July 1878. The pursuers are beneficiaries under the trust-deed. They are children of Jane Wilson or Armstrong, the truster's sister, and their interest in the estate is, as I gather, about two-thirteenth parts of the residue after the death of the truster's sister Elizabeth, liferentrix of the whole estate, heritable and moveable. She died on 23d January 1901.

"The trustees lodged their accounts, and the pursuers have lodged objections, which have been twice amended. The accounts, objections, and the trustees' answers have not been printed, and on that account the case is not brought out so plainly as it might have been; but the objections seem to me to fall under three heads: firstly, the pursuers say that the trustees are not entitled to take credit, as they have done, for three sums, £1223, 14s. 10d., £146, 14s. 1d., and £129, 8s. 6d., amounting in all to £1499, 17s. 5d., being money expended on the property; secondly, they object that no credit is given for any sum as the value of the goodwill of the business; and thirdly, they charge the trustees with sacrificing the trust to the interests of the liferentrix. I think these objections cover the whole of the pursuers' attack on the management and accounts of the trustees. Certain strictures are made about the trustees borrowing money from the liferentrix and granting her a bond and promissory-notes. But whether in doing so they violated the trust or not, that does not appear to me to enter into this case.

"In considering these objections it is necessary to keep in view the position of the liferentrix, Miss Wilson. She managed the truster's baking business, which was a large business for the place, and she was the person who dealt with all the customers, and latterly it appears that it was she, rather than the truster, who carried it on. In point of fact she continued it after his death, the whole stock in trade having been made over to her by the trustees at a valuation. The pursuers take no objection to this transaction, which appears to have been the most advantageous course which the trustees could have followed for the trust. Miss Wilson was herself nominated a trustee. But she did not attend the earlier trust meetings. At least she does not sign the earlier minutes, but on 1st April 1879 she signed a contract as a trustee. That was after a meeting held on 24th March 1879, when the trustees resolved, on consideration of a communication from her, to rebuild the premises.

"This case is somewhat unusual, for it does not proceed on any allegation of investment of the trust funds on bad security, or on any allegation of negligence, with which apparently the trustees were not at all chargeable and are not charged, but on questions arising in their management of the trust heritable property, consisting chiefly of buildings in Hawick. It is a case to which the observations of Lord M'Laren at sec. 2140 (on Wills) apply—where he says that 'a less rigorous view of the responsibilities of trustees has been taken with reference to charges of alleged omission or neglect in the collection of arrears of rents or debts prestable during the continuance of the trust. . . . Where the Court is satisfied that it has

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The expenditure of the trust funds in rebuilding was ultra vires of the trustees.[1] Brotchie v. Stewart,[2] and Sprot's Trustees v. Sprot,[3] were exceptions to the general rule, and were decided as they were in deference to what was found to be the intention of the testator. The trustees here were not granted power to rebuild, and there was nothing in the settlement from which such power could be implied. The intention of the truster was that the heritable and moveable estate should be kept separate. Drake v. Trefusis (1875), L. R. 10 Ch. 364, and Conway v. Fenton (1888), 40 Ch. D. 512, were decided upon applications for powers, and the latter was only a single Judge decision. The demands of the tenants and of the authorities were the result of the rebuilding. (2) The liferentrix had no right to reimbursement for expenditure on repairs and improvements.[4] (3) Even if the rebuilding was intra vires it was a speculative and imprudent investment of been on the whole beneficial, it will not, and it would be unjust that it should, enforce the rules of strict diligence against trustees in respect to such arrears of moderate amount as they may have failed to reduce into possession.'

"These observations have no precise bearing on the facts of this case—and in particular, I do not see that it can be affirmed that the trustees' management was on the whole beneficial—but still they shew the manner in which the Court is in use to regard such cases of the management by trustees of trust property.

"I think that the objection that no price for goodwill has been entered in the account should not be sustained, for I think it has not been proved that anything could have been got for goodwill; and it seems to me that an endeavour to recover a separate sum for goodwill would have been inconsistent with the transaction of the trustees with Miss Wilson, and the proof appears to be that the trustees got more by their transaction with her than they could have got by a public sale or in any other way. It was she who dealt with the customers, and any goodwill which could be ascribed to the business must have been created to a large extent by her own dealings with customers in the conduct of the business. I think the fair conclusion from the proof is that she paid the trustees a full price for all she received. On this point reference may be made to the case of Bell's Trustees v. Bell, 8th November 1884, 12 R. 85. The allegation that the trustees favoured Miss Wilson and sacrificed the interests of the trust to her interests raises a question of evidence, and I am of opinion that that allegation or insinuation is quite unproved as matter of fact. No doubt, whatever money was spent on the trust property may have benefited her as liferentrix and as continuing the business, and probably it did; but I think that the motive of the trustees was not to benefit her but the estate. Two of them were examined as witnesses, and I think they seem to have been honourable men, and to have managed the trust property carefully and conscientiously. I cannot affirm that their management was beneficial or successful, but I think that the want of success arose mainly from the facts that there occurred a dulness the trust funds, which had resulted in loss, and for which the trustees were liable.[1] (4) The trustees had unduly favoured the liferentrix, who was one of the trustees, and disregarded the interests of the fiars. The rebuilding and liability for the subsequent expenditure were undertaken at her request and solely for her benefit, and with the object of benefiting her only, whereas the interests of the fiars ought to have been the paramount consideration.[2] The trustees were not entitled to confer a benefit upon or enter into a contract with one of their own number, thus allowing a mixture of interests to arise.[3] The personal interests of the liferentrix in the transaction were antagonistic to those of the trust. Her absence from the meeting made no difference.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) The condition of the old buildings was such as to make their demolition necessary, in the staple trades of Hawick, and that the establishment of co-operative stores in the town affected very adversely such properties as were held by the trustees.

"At the same time I think that the objection of the pursuers, which I have mentioned first—that, namely, to the expenditure of £1499, 17s. 5d.—raises questions of very considerable difficulty. I do not know that it raises questions of legal difficulty. It regards the trustees' management of the property, and depends on the special circumstances.

"The property of which the trustees found themselves in the management was of a special character, at least that part of the property to which the pursuers' objections relate. It consisted of buildings in which the truster had lived and carried on his business. That business was well established, good, and lucrative, and I cannot think that the trustees were bound or would have been entitled to let it drop. They might reasonably have thought that the site was of value.

"Now, in regard to this branch of the case, it is worthy of some notice that none of the pursuers (being beneficiaries) who come into Court complaining of the mismanagement of the trustees are witnesses. There are four of them. One seems to be resident in London, but the other three appear to reside in the neighbourhood. They have not appeared to explain as witnesses their discontent with the management of the trustees, or their views as to what the trustees should have done in the circumstances which occurred.

"Now, the case which the defenders have made or endeavoured to make is of this nature. They say that the buildings were old and dilapidated and were indeed dangerous and liable to fall from their age and decay. I do not say the evidence is wholly satisfactory, but it is hardly met by the evidence of the pursuers. What the trustees did was to take down the old buildings and erect new ones. And on the whole, and without going into details, I am not prepared to say that in doing so they were grossly imprudent or over-speculative. Certainly I do not think that they were and the rebuilding was expedient in the interest of the trust. Part of the expenditure was necessitated by a fire. In the circumstances the trustees had an implied right to rebuild, and indeed a duty to do so.[1] But apart from that, they were given power to purchase heritage, and the expenditure on rebuilding was equivalent to expenditure on purchase. A power to purchase implied a right to rebuild.[2] The subsequent expenditure on improvements and extension was in the same position as the original expenditure on rebuilding. But further, the later expenditure was necessary either (a) because it was demanded by the authorities, or (b) in order to retain good tenants, which was in the interest of the fiars as well as of the liferentrix. The trustees had throughout acted with due regard to the respective rights of liferentrix and fiars in such circumstances.[3] (2) No benefit was conferred on the liferentrix by the actings of the negligent, or that they acted in the interests of Miss Wilson and in disregard of the interests of the trust.

"I am inclined to think on the evidence that they were justified in taking down the old buildings. They might perhaps have lasted a few years longer, perhaps not. But I do not consider that their conduct was such as to give rise to liability for breach of their trust.

"Having taken down the old buildings, what were the trustees to do? Was it their duty to leave the ground a barren site or were they entitled to continue the property as old, well-established baker's premises? I have great difficulty in dealing with this question. The pursuers maintain that it was wholly ultra vires of the trustees to employ the trust money in such a way, seeing the trust-deed contains no power to build, and that it was not within their authority to invest the trust money in such a manner. If the fact in this case had been that the trustees found a vacant piece of trust property, and had built on it premises for the conduct of some business, such as a baker's business, I would have held such an application of trust funds wholly beyond their powers, and would have held them liable for any loss that might have happened. I would have held it an investment of trust money quite ultra vires. But the very special circumstances of this case require consideration. Suppose it was necessary (not only expedient) to take down the whole buildings, or that the trustees were justified or excusable (which might be enough) in thinking so, are the trustees liable for replacing the old buildings which they were compelled to take down? I think that no case was quoted going that length. This, as I have observed, is not a case about unauthorised or imprudent investment of trust money. Several cases were quoted relating to such investments. But I think such cases (as for example the cases about investing in Greenock Harbour shares) are not at all in point. It was argued that investing trust money in building was ultra vires without express power. But I think that argument puts the proposition too high. In more than one case power to build has been held implied and to be intra vires of trustees without express power—Sprot's Trustees v. Sprot, 1830, 8 S. D. 712; Drake v. Trefusis, 1875, L. R. 10 Ch. 364; Conway v. Fenton, 1888, 40 Ch. 512. I am not prepared to hold that, in the circumstances, the expenditure of the trust money in rebuilding the baking premises must needs be disallowed as wholly ultra trustees. She was entitled to the interest of the moveable estate, and she got the increased rental instead of the interest. (3) The nett loss which had in fact been sustained was fully accounted for by ordinary tear and wear, and by the depreciation in value of property in Hawick, and particularly property of this class, due to dull trade and co-operative stores. (4) The pursuers were barred by mora and acquiescence.[1] The trustees had been prejudiced by the delay in challenging their actings. Many of the persons who knew the circumstances were dead. The pursuers and their father knew what was being done and took no objection at the time, or until now. Even now the pursuers did not come forward to give evidence in support of their contentions.

vires without regard to the special circumstances. I think they have to be examined, and that in this case the trustees must have the benefit of all presumptions arising from care in management and honest intentions.

"But then it is said that this scheme of the trustees of rebuilding the premises was speculative, imprudent, and unsuccessful. The pursuers say that the trust money was thrown away. At first the trustees certainly did not think so. There is a minute of trustees dated 10th February 1880 (No. 178) from which it appears that the buildings had been completed at a cost of £1223, 14s. 10d. (there were additions afterwards), and it bears that 'the trustees, after carefully considering the whole circumstances, expressed themselves as extremely gratified with the result of the rebuilding, and recorded and do hereby record their opinion that the rebuilding of the property has very considerably enhanced the value of the deceased's estate.'

"It is not unfairly suggested that those of the pursuers who lived in the neighbourhood must have thought the idea of the trustees at least plausible and hopeful, seeing that they allowed the demolition of the old buildings and the erection of the new ones to proceed without objection. But I am afraid this observation cannot be brought up to a defence of bar.

"I have no doubt that this was an honest opinion by the trustees, and if it was, it has some bearing on the present question. I fear, however, that the trustees could not have long retained their favourable opinion of the building operations, because there were two sums spent afterwards, £146, 14s. 1d. and £129, 8s. 6d., bringing the total cost up to £1499, 17s. 5d.; and when the property was sold on 10th October 1901 no more was obtained than £1400 (see minute, 10th October 1901) for the buildings and the site. This price was obtained by private bargain, after the property had been exposed on several occasions to public sale.

"The pursuers maintained that this shewed a loss on the whole transaction of £100 plus the value of the site, which they maintained was of itself, apart from all buildings, worth £500.

"If this fall of price could not be accounted for on some special ground, then it certainly would appear that the operations of the trustees had resulted in a considerable loss.

"But the trustees say, and I think they have proved, although the proof is not all one way, that a great fall in the value of such property had taken place in the meantime, in consequence partly of dulness of trade in Hawick, but chiefly in consequence of the establishment of co-operative stores there, in consequence of which (some of the witnesses say) the value of other shops had been much diminished. I do not know how far the opinions of certain shares of the estate left by the late Walter Wilson, baker in Hawick, under his testamentary settlement, and the question presented for decision is whether they have established against the defenders, who are the trustees under that settlement, personal liability in respect of loss which they allege to have been incurred by their (the trustees) rebuilding certain property in Hawick which belonged to the truster, as well as by their failing to give credit for what they allege to have been a saleable goodwill in a baking business in Hawick, and otherwise favouring the life-rentrix of his testamentary estate at the expense of the fiars.

Walter Wilson died on 6th July 1878, leaving a testamentary trust-disposition and settlement dated 11th February 1876, by which he disposed of his means and estate. Under that settlement, Miss Wilson, his sister, had right to the liferent of his free means and estate, and the present action was not raised till 30th September 1902, more than twenty-four years after his death.

The first meeting of the trustees appointed by him under his testamentary settlement was held in Hawick on the 16th July 1878, four of the trustees, Messrs Wilson, Ker, Dryden, and Grierson, being present. Miss Wilson, though nominated a trustee under her brother's testamentary settlement, was not present at any of the first three meetings of his trustees.

At that (the first) meeting, the trustees appointed Mr Thomas Dryden, one of their number, to be factor on the trust, with power to manage the heritable property, to collect the rents and interests of the trust-estate, and to account to the trustees half-yearly for his intromissions.

Mr Haddon was appointed law-agent for the trust, with the usual powers, these witnesses are well founded. But it is a circumstance which requires to be taken into account in considering both the action of the trustees and the apparent loss to the trust-estate. It was argued that what was apparently loss caused by the trustees' operations was really not so at all, but was the result of certain definite adverse circumstances which the trustees could not control or foresee. If that was so, then I think that loss to the trust by the buildings would not have been proved.

"With regard to the two smaller sums, £146, 14s. 1d. and £129, 8s. 6d., I do not think there are sufficient materials in the proof to admit of treating them on a different footing. Both were additions to the cost of the new building. The former sum is mentioned in the minute of the trustees, dated 3d December 1889, from which it appears that the expense had been defrayed, when incurred, by Miss Wilson, and that the factor on the property, Mr Dryden, had reported that the works as permanent improvements should be charged against capital; but should not be repaid until Miss Wilson's death, she getting the benefit of the improvements and bearing the burden of them during her life.

"The other sum, £129, 8s. 6d., is mentioned in the minute of date 7th March 1894 (No. 180 of process). This is in much the same position as the former sum, only the necessity of this expenditure is not so clearly made out. I have to regret, on this part of the case, the absence from the proof of the factor, Mr Dryden, who was indisposed at the date of the proof. As the proof stands, I do not find that I have sufficient grounds for separating these two additions to the cost from the rest, and I think the case must be dealt with as if the primary cost had been £1499, 17s. 5d. instead of £1223, 14s. 10d.

"On the whole case I think that the pursuers have failed to make out a case of liability against the trustees."

and he was instructed to take the necessary steps for ascertaining and realising the personal estate, and completing the title of the trustees to both it and the heritable property left by the truster.

The trustees present at the meeting resolved to make over to Miss Wilson the stock in trade, shop and bakehouse, furniture, fittings, utensils, &c. in the premises in the Howegate, Hawick, in which the truster had carried on his business as a baker, and such portion of the book debts as she might wish to acquire, at a valuation. Miss Wilson had long assisted her brother in the conduct of that business.

The formal business appropriate to a first meeting of trustees was transacted, and recorded in the minute, and I understood that the pursuers' counsel did not complain of anything which is recorded as having been done at that meeting.

The next meeting was held on 21st October 1878, when an inventory and valuation of the stock in trade, shop and bakehouse furniture, fittings, utensils, &c., in the baking premises, made up in terms of the instructions given at the last-mentioned meeting, were submitted. That inventory and valuation amounted to £116, 2s., and the trustees directed that these assets should be made over to Miss Wilson at that price. A list of the book-debts due to the deceased considered good, amounting to £226, 3s. 10d., was also submitted, and the trustees directed that these debts should be made over to Miss Wilson on payment of that amount.

The minute of the next meeting of the trustees, held on 24th March 1879, bears that Mr Dryden stated that in consequence of the property No. 10 Howegate, which formed part of the trust-estate, being thatched, the expense of upholding it was very great, and that the property was besides old and dilapidated, and that the meeting had been called to consider an application by Miss Wilson that the trustees should rebuild the premises. Plans and specifications directed to carry out this proposal were submitted, the total estimated cost of the proposed rebuilding being £692, 19s., exclusive of painting and extras, which, it was expected, would raise the total cost to £850. Mr Dryden explained that the then present rental of the property was £32, 10s., and that it was believed that after being rebuilt the property would yield a rental of upwards of £85. The minute bears that the meeting having carefully considered the proposal, three of the four trustees present were of opinion that the rebuilding of the property was necessary and expedient, and in the whole circumstances offered a fair and legitimate investment for the balance of the trust funds which would be available for investment at the following Whitsunday, and that they resolved to proceed with the rebuilding forthwith, on condition that Miss Wilson bound herself to observe and perform the terms and conditions therein mentioned, the first of which was that she should undertake the whole responsibility in connection with the rebuilding, and the whole management of it. It was resolved that the trustees should expend the whole trust funds available for investment, after payment of the truster's debts, and the legacies and other bequests payable in terms of his settlement, in rebuilding the property, on the express condition and understanding that Miss Wilson would provide whatever further sums might be necessary for fully completing the property after the available trust funds had been exhausted.

No. 61.

Dec. 23, 1904. Armstrong v. Wilson's Trustees.

The minute further bears that it was arranged that an agreement should be entered into between the trustees and Miss Wilson, containing the conditions and provisions mentioned, and that the law-agent was instructed to have the necessary agreement prepared and executed at once, so that the work might be proceeded with. Mr Grierson, one of the trustees, stated that he did not consider the rebuilding of the property either necessary or expedient, and he consequently resigned the office of trustee and executor, and his resignation was accepted.

A meeting of the trustees was held on 10th February 1880, the minute of which bears that an account of charge and discharge of the trustees' intromissions with the proceeds of the estate as at 3d February 1880 was submitted, and that after examination it was found to be correct and sufficiently vouched. That account closed with a balance of £597, 16s. 3d. due to the trustees, which sum, the minute bears, "falls to be borrowed from Miss Wilson on bond as formerly arranged," and the agent in the trust was instructed to have the bond for that amount in Miss Wilson's favour prepared, executed, and delivered forthwith.

Mr Dryden, who had superintended the erection of the new buildings, reported that the total cost of rebuilding the property was £1223, 14s. 10d., this cost having been much less than was anticipated, owing to the fact that the cost of labour and material was considerably less than it had been for many years. He also stated that the rental of the new buildings was £123, which might be considerably increased, that the annual value of the old buildings was £32, 10s., and that as the old property was dilapidated and covered with thatch, considerable expense was annually incurred in repairing it.

The minute further bears that the trustees after carefully considering the whole circumstances, expressed themselves as extremely gratified with the result of the rebuilding, and recorded their opinion that it had very considerably enhanced the value of the deceased's estate. The trustees further resolved, as the whole trust-estate then consisted of the properties Nos. 8 and 10 Howegate and 7 Buccleuch Street, Hawick, with the view of avoiding expense, to permit Miss Wilson to uplift and receive the rents and annual produce of the estate until her death or marriage, and they authorised her accordingly. Instructions were also given to Mr Thomas Dryden to see that Miss Wilson kept the properties in good and sufficient repair, and also that the insurances in name of the trustees over the properties were maintained in force.

A fire occurred at the Howegate property in 1882, and after the buildings destroyed by it had been reinstated by the insurance company with whom they were insured, it was found necessary to take down the back gable and replace part of the roof of the back house, owing to its insecure and dilapidated condition, the cost of these works being £66, 11s. 4d. In 1884 the local authority called upon the trustees to put water-closets into the Howegate property, and they were consequently obliged to do so. It appears that a washing-house was also erected, as being necessary for retaining good tenants, and that in 1886 the sum of £53, 12s. 3d. was incurred in increasing the accommodation in the Howegate property, and these sums, amounting together to £146, 14s. 1d., were paid by Miss

Wilson. It was stated at the meeting that all these works were in the circumstances necessary, and formed permanent improvements on the property, and increased its value by more than the cost. The trustees granted a promissory-note to Miss Wilson for the £146, 14s. 1d. above mentioned, payable at her death, without interest during her life.

It appears from a minute of the trustees of 7th March 1894, that the tenant of a shop and dwelling-house in the property No. 10 Howegate, belonging to the trust, had represented that it was subject to various inconveniencies, and alterations and additions were made to it at the cost of £129, 8s. 6d., which sum was paid by Miss Wilson. The trustees accordingly granted a promissory-note for that amount in her favour, payable on her death, and not to bear interest during her life.

The total value of the moveable estate left by the truster in the United Kingdom was ascertained to be £1939, 2s. 6d.

Miss Wilson died on 23d January 1901, and the truster's estate consequently became available for division amongst the beneficiaries under his testamentary settlement.

The question which we have now to decide is whether the beneficiaries under the truster's testamentary settlement have established grounds for holding his trustees personally liable for the losses to the trust-estate, which they maintain to have been incurred by the trustees, especially with respect to the Howegate property, and I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that they have not.

The action of the trustees in regard to the heritable property of the trust turned out in the result to be unfortunate, but I do not think that it was in any way dishonest or blameworthy. They had to consider a difficult question as to the best mode of dealing with the Howegate property, and I cannot say that the course which they followed was ultra vires or even injudicious. It appears that the property never was structurally of a good class. It was an old property, apparently constructed of boulder stones and thatched, and it was altogether unsuitable for the purposes of a dwelling-house and baker's shop according to modern ideas. The truster and Miss Wilson seem to have been successful in the business, and it was not unreasonably thought desirable to preserve the goodwill of it in so far as that depended upon customers continuing to resort to the old shop. It appears that the heritable goodwill might have remained of value had it not been that Hawick has suffered from depressed trade conditions, and that the competition of co-operative stores has proved detrimental, as it has done to many shops throughout the country. No doubt rebuilding involved elements of risk, and perhaps of speculation, but it was practically forced upon the trustees by circumstances, and I see no reason to doubt that they acted honestly and intelligently, and therefore I do not think it would be reasonable to make them personally liable for the consequences of circumstances over which they had no control. A considerable fall appears to have taken place in the value of property in the locality, partly due to dulness of trade in Hawick, and perhaps still more to the establishment of co-operative stores there, by which the business of individual shopkeepers, including bakers, has been seriously affected, but I do not think that the trustees could have foreseen this in the exercise of an honest and intelligent judgment. I see no evidence of any desire or intention on the part of the trustees in any way to favour Miss Wilson at the cost and risk of the estate and the other persons beneficially interested in it.

Upon the whole matter I think that the Lord Ordinary is right in finding that it has not been proved that in the management of the trust-estate the trustees acted imprudently, negligently, or unfairly, or that loss to the estate has been caused by their fault, and I am therefore of opinion that his Lordship's interlocutor of 30th June 1904 should be adhered to.

2D DIVISION.

ADAM CURRIE, who resided at Firgrove, Castlehead, Paisley, died at Rothesay, on 8th February 1904, leaving a holograph trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th October 1903.

At the time of his death Mr Currie was from home, and his settlement, along with an unsigned and uninitialed list written in ink of the names of the legatees and legacies mentioned in the settlement with pencil alterations thereon, were found in a travelling bag which he had with him at the time of his death.

The settlement bore a number of pencil alterations, consisting of deletions by a pencil line drawn through the names of certain legatees and their legacies, and in other cases by the substitution of different sums for those mentioned in the settlement. The pencil markings were not authenticated in any way.

Questions having arisen as to the effect to be given to the pencil alterations, a special case was presented to the Court, to which the trustees of Mr Adam Currie, the testator, were the first parties, and the second, third, and fifth parties were persons interested in supporting the will as it originally stood. The fourth party was William Fulton, accountant, Paisley, curator bonis to Miss Jane Richardson Currie, who contended that the alterations and deletions made by the testator shewed that he did not intend the settlement to remain as an operative will, and alternatively that said alterations and deletions inferred a cancellation of the legacies to which they applied.

It was stated in the special case that "the alterations so far as in writing are holograph of the testator, and it is presumed that the other alterations and deletions on the documents were also made by the testator."

The questions were:—"(1) Is the said trust-disposition and settlement valid and effectual? (2) If the preceding question be answered in the affirmative, do the deletions and alterations on said trust-disposition and settlement, or any and which of them, fall to receive effect in construing the testamentary writings of the deceased Adam Currie?"

The first, second, third, and fifth parties referred to Pattisons' Trustees v. Edinburgh University[1] and Hamilton's Trustees v. Hamilton.[2]

The fourth party referred to Lamont's Trustees v. Magistrates of Glasgow.[3]

At the close of the discussion, LORD YOUNG stated that he was not prepared to express an opinion without further consideration, and the parties thereupon agreed to accept the opinions of the other three Judges.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think this is a very clear matter on the decisions. Mr Sandeman has argued his case very fairly and frankly, and has been unable to put before us any judgment that would favour his contention. In several cases it has been distinctly decided that alterations on a signed will, in order to be valid, must be authenticated in some way, and here there is no authentication whatever. On the authorities it appears to me that alterations like the present made by pencil must be held to be merely deliberative, and I should have arrived at that conclusion apart from the decisions. When a man has signed his will, and is considering whether he should alter it, it is quite natural that he should draft proposed alterations in pencil. But that he should suppose that in making these pencil alterations he was indicating his final opinion I cannot conceive. At anyrate I am perfectly clearly of opinion that it cannot be held that he did so. In the case of Hamilton's Trustees,[2] an unsigned holograph memorandum was handed by the testator to his law-agents to be put up with his settlement, and nevertheless it was held that that memorandum was not effectual as a bequest, because the Court considered that it was merely deliberative. We were referred to the case of Lamont,[3] but that was a very different case. In that case the truster had expressly directed his trustees to give effect to any writing, although defective in the solemnities required by law, from which they might be satisfied as to his intention and wishes. That is an entirely different case from the present, on which its only bearing is as an illustration of the general rule that alterations of a will must, except in very special circumstances, be authenticated.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the pencil alterations here were not effectual, and therefore that the second question in the case should be answered in the negative.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with your Lordship. It appears to me that this is a clear case, ruled absolutely by authority, and that there is no room for argument.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am quite of the same opinion. There are here two documents under consideration, the one being the original will of the deceased on which there are certain deletions and alterations in pencil, and the other an uninitialed holograph note or jottings also altered both in pencil and in ink. I take the latter first. The manner in which the alterations have been made shews the tentative or deliberative way in which the testator has made them. He writes in ink, and then cancels in pencil. The question is what effect is to be given to the jottings and to the pencil alterations. I think it is evident that the deceased changed his mind from day to day, and made these alterations on the document without arriving at any fixed or settled resolution as to changing his will. With regard to the will the alterations thereon are so faint as to be hardly visible. However, it is quite sufficient for the decision of this case that on the authorities alterations of this kind are not to be given effect to unless they are in some way authenticated, or amount to distinct evidence of an evinced intention to alter or cancel which the law can recognise. I therefore agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

IN an action at the instance of the owners of a vessel against the proprietor of Granton Harbour for damages arising from their vessel grounding on a reef in the harbour, the pursuers obtained decree, with expenses, and a remit was made to the Auditor. To the account of expenses lodged by the pursuers there was appended an account incurred to a firm of London solicitors in connection with the preparation of the case. The Auditor having refused to deal with the English account, counsel for the pursuers moved the Court to remit it to the Taxing Officer of the Supreme Court of Judicature, London, with a request that he should tax it as between party and party, and referred to Camper & Nicholsons, Limited, v. Wemyss.[1] Counsel for the defender objected, and contended that the English account should in the first place be remitted to the Auditor to report what items therein were chargeable as between party and party according to Scottish practice.

THE COURT (LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR, the LORD PRESIDENT being absent) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the account of expenses incurred to Messrs Pritchard & Sons, solicitors, London, which is appended to the pursuers' account of expenses, falls to be taxed as between party and party according to English rules: Therefore remit the said account to the Taxing Officer of the Supreme Court of Judicature, the Taxing Office of the Royal Courts of Justice, London, with a request that he will examine and report at what figure the said account falls to be taxed as between party and party."

Held that an obligation by a husband in a marriage-contract to make certain payments to his marriage-contract trustees for behoof of his wife and children, as the counterpart of similar obligations by his wife, could not be regarded on his death as a debt incurred by him "for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit," in the sense of the Finance Act, 1894, and did not form a proper deduction in determining the value of his estate for the purposes of estate-duty.

Held also that a similar obligation by a father in his son's marriage-contract, as the counterpart of an obligation by the son's wife and her father, could not be deducted as a debt.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR CLAUD ALEXANDER of Ballochmyle, Baronet, died at Westminster, on 23d May 1899, survived by his wife Eliza, Lady Alexander, and by his son Claud Alexander younger, an only child.

Upon Sir Claud Alexander's death his trustees and executors gave up an inventory of his personal and moveable estate, and in appropriate accounts annexed to it they specified other property in respect of which estate-duty was payable on his death.

In the schedule of debts which were deducted from the personal and moveable estate were included the following entries:—"115. Cost of aliment of the deceased's widow from date of death to November 1899, when her provisions became payable, and mournings, £1000." "116. Amount of provisions covenanted to be paid by deceased to his widow by their antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 11th February 1863, for the considerations therein specified, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening after his death £2000." Also, in preparing an estimate of the gross principal value of the heritable estate a deduction from its gross annual value was made of the following item:—"Annuity of £1500 in favour of Eliza, Lady Alexander, deceased's widow, secured by deceased over Ballochmyle estate, or a portion thereof, by his antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 11th February 1863, for the considerations therein specified, £1500." And in bringing out the net principal value of the heritable estate for assessment to duty a deduction was made on account of the sum of £30,000 as a debt constituted by the deceased's bond and disposition in security, dated 6th December 1889, in favour of the trustees in the said antenuptial contract of marriage between Claud Alexander younger and Lady Diana Montgomerie.

Jan. 10, 1905. Inland Revenue v. Alexander's Trustees.

Objection was taken by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to these deductions on the ground that sums which the defenders had deducted did not represent debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by him bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for his own use and benefit, and did not come within the terms of sec. 7, subsec. (1) (a), of the Finance Act, 1894,* and on 15th January 1904 the present action was raised on their behalf by the Lord Advocate against Eliza, Lady Alexander and others, the trustees of Sir Claud Alexander, to have the defenders ordained to render a full account of the estate of the deceased and for payment of estate-duty.

Marriage-Contract of Sir Claud Alexander.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 11th February 1863, Major-General Sir Claud Alexander of Ballochmyle, Baronet, in contemplation of his marriage, and in consideration of a conveyance on her part by his intended wife, then Miss Eliza Speirs, afterwards Lady Alexander, bound and obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever to pay to the trustees under the contract, (1) during the lifetime of the said Eliza Speirs, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity of £1500, free of all deductions whatever; and (2) the sum of £2000 in lieu of household furniture. He also bound himself to aliment his widow from the day of his death until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter. In security of these obligations Sir Claud Alexander conveyed to the trustees certain portions of the land of Ballochmyle.

On her part Miss Speirs conveyed to the trustees a sum of £11,000 belonging to her, and her own and her mother's interest in a sum of £6000, provided and settled by her mother's antenuptial contract, for the following purposes,—(1) payment of the free yearly proceeds to the spouses and the survivor; (2) division of the capital among the children of the marriage after the death of the surviving spouse; and (3) in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, disposal of the capital as Miss Speirs might direct.

Miss Speirs accepted the provisions in her favour in full satisfaction of her legal rights in the event of her survivance.

Marriage-Contract of Claud Alexander younger.

Sir Claud Alexander, in the antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 6th, 9th, and 11th December 1889, between his son Claud Alexander younger of Ballochmyle and Lady Diana Montgomerie, daughter of the Earl of Eglinton and Winton, bound himself to pay to the marriage-contract trustees £30,000 as a provision for the intended spouses and the children of the marriage. In security of this sum Sir Claud Alexander granted a bond and disposition in security, dated 6th December 1889, over the estate of Ballochmyle under the declaration that the trustees should not be entitled during his lifetime to demand payment of the £30,000, so long as he regularly paid to his son or the trustees the sum of £1000 per annum, to which amount the annual interest was restricted. The trust purposes were (1) payment of the income of the fund to Claud Alexander the younger, subject to an annuity of £750 to Lady Diana Montgomerie if she survived her husband; and (2) payment of the capital to the children of the marriage and issue of predeceasers, and, failing children or issue, to the survivor of Sir Claud Alexander and his son.

On the other part Lady Diana Montgomerie conveyed to the trustees the whole means and estate then belonging to her, or that she might acquire stante matrimonio, including £5000 belonging to her, and £12,000, contingently restrictable to £9000, the share apportioned to her by her father out of a provision of £36,000 for younger children under his own marriage-contract. She also bound herself, in the event of her succeeding to the entailed estate of Montgomerie, to disentail and convey it to the trustees. Further, the Earl of Eglinton and Winton agreed to pay his daughter £400 a year during the joint lives of Sir Claud Alexander and himself. The purposes of the trust were:—(1) Payment of the income to Lady Diana during her life; (2) after her death payment of the income to Claud Alexander, the younger, should he survive her; and (3) after the death of the spouses payment of the capital to the children of the marriage and the issue of predeceasers as Lady Diana Montgomerie might appoint. Lady Diana Montgomerie further accepted the provisions of the marriage-contract in full satisfaction of her legal rights.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The deductions, which the defenders claim a right to make in assessing the value of the deceased's property for the purpose of duty, are not such as can be allowed on a sound construction of the Finance Act, 1894.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) On a sound construction of the Finance Act, 1894, the defenders are entitled to make the deductions claimed in assessing the value of the deceased's property for the purpose of estate-duty.

On 24th November 1904, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) appointed the defenders to deliver to the pursuer the account called for in the summons,* and on 10th December 1904 his Lordship granted leave to reclaim.

* "OPINION.—The first question in this case is whether, in determining the value of the late Sir Claud Alexander's estate for the purpose of estate-duty, his trustees are entitled to make certain deductions in respect of provisions contained in his own marriage-contract, and in that of his son, to which he was a party. The question turns on section 7 of the Finance Act, 1894, which provides that allowance shall be made for 'debts and incumbrances,' but not 'for debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth, wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit.' The obligations undertaken by Sir Claud in his own and his son's marriage-contract were undoubtedly debts, and, in so far as secured over his estate, they were also 'incumbrances.' But the trustees must shew that the debts or incumbrances are of a kind which satisfy the other requirements of section 7. They endeavour to do this, as regards Sir Claud's own contract, by pointing to the fact that his intended wife brought into settlement a considerable fortune, which she had partly in her own right and partly in expectancy, and that she accepted Sir Claud's provisions in her favour as in full satisfaction of her legal rights in the event of her surviving him. As regards his son's contract, they find the 'full consideration in money or money's worth' required by section 7 for the provision of £30,000 made by Sir Claud in the counter-stipulations undertaken by the lady and her father, Lord Eglinton, in favour of the spouses and children of the marriage.

"Now, even if this question had to be solved on the words of sec. 7 of

No. 64.

Jan. 10, 1905. Inland Revenue v. Alexander's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The trustees were entitled to make the deductions claimed. In the case of Sir Claud Alexander's own marriage-contract, Miss Speirs had brought in a considerable fortune, and she had renounced valuable rights. Similarly, in the case of the son's marriage-contract Lord Eglinton and his daughter had contributed largely to the marriage-contract funds, and the daughter had given up her legal rights. In each case, therefore, the provisions had been made by Sir Claud Alexander in consideration of provisions made on the other side, and full consideration in money or money's worth had therefore been given for these provisions. The present case was distinguished from Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick.[1] In that case the parents on either side had provided the funds, while here the parties were contracting with their own money. The obligation to aliment was a debt at common law, and the fact that it had been made matter of contract did not the Finance Act alone, without the aid of decision, I should find it very difficult to resist the argument for the Crown. I should say that, to make a debt incurred or incumbrance created by the deceased himself deductible in determining the value of his estate for the purpose of estate-duty, the debt or incumbrance must be shewn to have originated in something of the nature of a proper purchase, in which the deceased received, for his own use and benefit, full consideration in money or money's worth. I should say that it could not, therefore, cover any stipulation in a marriage-contract, although reciprocal in character and issuing in a debt incumbrance, where the true consideration is a thing incapable of being expressed in money or money's worth—to wit, the marriage itself.

"But I find that the question is, for me at least, foreclosed by the decision in Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick (4 R. 815). That judgment is none the less apposite for having been pronounced before the date of the Finance Act, inasmuch as it proceeded on the words of sec. 17 of the Succession-Duty Act of 1853, which are similar to, but less forcible than, the words of sec. 7 (1) (a). I call them less forcible, for, instead of 'valuable consideration in money or money's worth,' the latter Act speaks of 'full consideration in money or money's worth.' It is true that Lord Deas dissented, but the view of the majority (Lord President Inglis, Lord Mure, and Lord Shand) found support in the reasoning of Lord Westbury in Floyer v. Bankes (3 De G. J. and S. 306). Sidgwick's case presented both of the important elements that are here founded on, viz., that the intending wife and her father brought her own fortune into settlement, and that she accepted the intending husband's provisions in her favour as in full satisfaction of her legal rights. Some stress is laid in the opinions of the Judges on the intending husband having had no estate of his own at the date of the contract on which terce or jus relictæ could arise, whereas here, it is said (at least in the case of Sir Claud's own contract), the intending husband had a valuable estate. But I do not read the opinions as turning essentially on that circumstance; and, indeed, it is manifest that, whatever may be the state of the husband's property at the date of the contract, the legal rights emerging in the event of his predecease are always more or less problematical in value. In another respect this case is stronger than Sidgwick's, for the words of the Finance Act requiring that the deductible debts or incumbrances must have been incurred or created 'wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit' are not to be found in the Succession-Duty Act, and it would be difficult to say that Sir Claud took any personal benefit either from the renunciation of Lady Alexander's legal rights in his own marriage-contract, or from the provisions made by Lord Eglinton and alter its character. It was still a debt exigible from the estate of the deceased.[1] In view of the decision in Inland Revenue v. Stewart's Trustees[2] it was admitted that settlement estate-duty was due.

Argued for the respondent;—No consideration in money or money's worth had been given for the provisions made by Sir Claud Alexander in the marriage-contracts. The case of Sidgwick[3] was directly in point. The ground of judgment in that case was that the true consideration for the mutual obligations undertaken in a marriage-contract was not the money but the marriage. The consideration of marriage was not a consideration in money or money's worth.[4] The ratio of the decision in Sidgwick[3] was not displaced by the distinction attempted to be made in this case, on the ground that Sir Claud Alexander and Miss Speirs were dealing with their own money. In point of fact, the son had put no funds of his own into his marriage-contract. The rights which were said to have been renounced by Miss Speirs and Lady Diana Montgomerie were not vested rights, and the provisions made by these ladies were family provisions for the benefit of their children as well as themselves. Further, the £30,000 provided in the son's marriage-contract had not been paid at the date of Sir Claud Alexander's death, and was therefore chargeable with estate-duty.[5] At anyrate, it was quite clear that the provisions made by Sir Claud Alexander were not debts or incumbrances incurred or created "wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit." The payment of interim aliment might or might not be a debt against Sir Claud Alexander's estate, but in any case it did not come under the proviso last quoted, and could not therefore be deducted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the Lord Ordinary has disposed of this case rightly, and I am for adhering to his judgment, substantially for the reasons his daughter in the marriage-contract of the son. Accordingly my judgment on the first question is for the Crown.

"The second question relates to the liability of the trustees for settlement estate-duty; but the trustees concede that this question is determined against them by the case of Stewart's Trustees, 1 F. 416.

"There is a subsidiary question as to the obligations undertaken by Sir Claud, in the event of his predecease, to aliment his widow from the day of his death until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, and to provide mournings for her. I understood the Crown to concede that a sum for mournings was deductible as falling under 'reasonable funeral expenses,' which are expresly mentioned in sec. 7; and that is the legal category to which a widow's mournings may be referred, according to Lord Fraser's book on 'Husband and Wife,' at p. 967. But it is clear that the claim for interim aliment cannot be brought under that head; and however much it may be a proper debt against an executor, I do not see that where it forms part of the provisions in a marriage-contract it is in any different position from the other provisions of the deed, for the purposes of estate-duty.

"I shall therefore order an account, both as regards estate-duty and settlement estate-duty."

he has given. I think, with his Lordship, that the case of the Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick [1] is a very valuable authority, but I agree that the present case is, in one important respect, distinguished from that, because the question which had to be considered in the case of Sidgwick [1] was whether moneys settled in contemplation of marriage by the father of the bride were to be treated as a consideration in money for a settlement made by the father of the bridegroom. It might very well be that these two settlements could not be considered as counterparts of one another, and yet that when each of the contracting parties themselves agrees to settle a sum of money their contributions might be taken as reciprocal considerations. But although that distinction has been taken, and is certainly justified by the facts, I think that, in substance, the two cases are not distinguishable. But if they were, I think we must keep in view that we are not construing the same words as those which were construed in the case of Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick,[1] but a different provision of a different statute, and that we must consider whether in the present case the condition of the Finance Act of 1894 is or is not satisfied. The provision is this, that in determining the value of an estate for the purpose of estate-duty, allowance shall be made for debts and incumbrances, but such an allowance is not to be made for debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by dispositions made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit. Therefore the question we have to consider is whether any of the items which are said to constitute debts deductible from the estate of the deceased Sir Claud Alexander were debts incurred or incumbrances created for full consideration in money or money's worth, and wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit. Now, the consideration in respect of which it is said the marriage-contract provisions for his widow and children are to be deducted is said to be the settlement by Miss Speirs, afterwards Lady Alexander, in contemplation of the marriage, of two sums of £11,000 and £6000, which were settled in trust for payment of the free yearly proceeds to the spouses and the survivor of them, for paying the whole proceeds for behoof of the children of the marriage, and for division of the capital amongst them after the death of the surviving spouse, and in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, for disposal as Lady Alexander might appoint.

I think the main consideration upon which the case of the Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick [1] was decided is directly in point. The question is whether this settlement of money belonging to Miss Speirs was the full consideration in money or money's worth of the settlement made by her intended husband. The doctrine laid down by the Judges in the Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick [1] is this, that where the obligations, or mutual obligations of that kind, are undertaken in a marriage-contract, they are not money considerations for one another, but that the true consideration is not the money but the marriage. The ground upon which that doctrine is rested is very fully and clearly explained in the judgment of the Lord President. The distinction to which I have already adverted does not seem to me to displace that consideration at all. The marriage is still the counterpart of the money obligation upon both sides, because the true moving cause and consideration for the settlement of money is the marriage. But if it could be suggested that the mutual money obligations were still, in a reasonable sense, counterparts of one another, so that they might be treated as considerations for one another, still I think the words of the statute we are now construing would not be satisfied, because we must determine, in order to give effect to the defender's contention, that the money contributed by the wife was not only a part consideration for any benefit she took under the marriage-contract from her husband's funds, but the full consideration in money or money's worth for all that she got by the contract. Now, it seems to be clear enough that the true consideration was not the money settled by her, but the marriage, and at all events that it is impossible to say that her settlement in money was the sole consideration for the settlement made by the husband. But even if it were, that would not be enough to satisfy the condition of the statute, because it goes on to say that allowance is not to be made for debts unless they were incurred "wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit," and that clause appears to me to be conclusive of the whole matter. I think it is quite impossible to say that the money settled upon Lady Alexander herself and the children of the marriage was settled solely for the use and benefit of the husband, and as a consideration for his own benefit—given to him in return for the money which he had himself settled. That last clause is, as I have said, I think, quite conclusive.

For these reasons I agree with the Lord Ordinary as to the effect of the contract of marriage between Sir Claud Alexander and Lady Alexander. But then I think it was conceded—at all events I think it is quite clear—that the same reasoning applies even more obviously and directly to the question arising under the second contract, the son's contract of marriage, and I think it furnishes also the true answer to the last point that was raised, whether a deduction ought not to be made in respect of the obligation under Sir Claud Alexander's marriage-contract to aliment his widow from the date of his death until the first term thereafter. The question whether deduction is to be made on that account must be determined by exactly the same consideration, whether it does or does not fall within the words of the statutory provision allowing deductions—that is to say, a statutory provision allowing debts to be excluded from the account.

Is the obligation upon Sir Claud Alexander's executry to aliment his widow until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas a debt incurred for full consideration in money or money's worth, and wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit? I think it is quite clear that it is not; and therefore, upon the same grounds as I think we ought to decide the question upon the two marriage-contracts, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment upon that third question also. We are told that there is a question as to the liability of the trustees for settlement estate-duty, but the reclaimers concede that the question is ruled by the decision in the case of Stewart's Trustees,[1] which they also concede is binding on this Court. We have heard no argument upon that matter, PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF WICK, Defenders (Respondents).—Shaw, K.C.—M'Lennan.

Burgh—Town-clerk—Munus publicum—Salary—Extension of burgh—Discretion of Town-Council as to fixing salary.—A royal burgh having been extended by the inclusion of a neighbouring burgh, the town-council raised the town-clerk's salary from £100 to £120. The town-clerk brought an action against the town-council for declarator that the defenders were bound to pay him a reasonable and suitable salary as fixed by the Court. The pursuer averred that the increased salary as fixed by the town-council after the extension was quite inadequate looking to the increase of the town-clerk's duties.

The Court (aff. the judgment of Lord Kincairney) assoilzied the defenders, holding that the question of an increase in the amount of the salary of a town-clerk was a matter for the discretion of the town-council, with the bona fide exercise of which the Court would not interfere.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

IN January 1904 Hector Sutherland, designing himself as "solicitor, Wick," brought an action against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Wick, concluding for declarator "(1) that the defenders are bound and obliged to provide for and pay to the pursuer, as town-clerk of the said burgh of Wick, a reasonable and suitable remuneration for his services as town-clerk foresaid; and (2) that the defenders are bound and obliged to make payment to the pursuer, as town-clerk foresaid, of the sum of £280 sterling per annum, or such other sum as our said Lords may find to be reasonable and suitable remuneration to the pursuer as town-clerk foresaid, as from the 18th day of November 1902."

The circumstances out of which the action arose were thus explained in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—"This action has arisen out of the recent amalgamation of the adjacent burghs of Wick and Pulteneytown, and relates to the salary of the town-clerk of the burgh as extended by the Act by which the amalgamation was effected. That Act confirmed a Provisional Order, and was passed on 18th November 1902. It is entitled 'The Wick Burgh Extension Order Confirmation Act, 1902.' It takes the form of an extension of the burgh of Wick rather than of an amalgamation of Wick and Pulteneytown, and its effect seems to be to extinguish the burgh of Pulteneytown and to enlarge the burgh of Wick so as to include within its boundaries the old burgh and royalty of Wick, the burgh of Pulteneytown, the harbour of Pulteneytown, and other adjacent lands.

Sutherland v. Magistrates of Wick.

"By section 3 of the Act (the interpretation clause) it is provided that the 'existing burgh of Wick' means the burgh of Wick, including the royalty as existing immediately previous to the commencement of the Order; that the 'burgh' and 'royal burgh' mean the existing burgh of Wick as extended by the Order; and that 'town-clerk' means the town-clerk of the 'existing burgh of Wick and of the burgh.'

"The pursuer of this action is the town-clerk of the extended burgh. He does not take that title in the instance, but he sues in that capacity, and can have no possible case unless he is so. He is not an applicant for the office, nor a person to whom the office has been offered, or who claims to be entitled to be appointed; he is, or at least must claim to be, the actual holder of that office.

"His position is as follows:—He has been town-clerk of the burgh of Wick since 1886. It is not very distinctly set forth what his salary or emoluments were then. In 1897 the Magistrates instituted an inquiry in regard to the salaries of the various servants and officials of the burgh, the result of which as regards the town-clerkship was that the town-clerk's salary was fixed at £100, besides business chambers rent free. To what extent he was allowed legal charges for work done for the burgh is not stated quite distinctly. The salary was fixed after inquiry as to the salaries of the town-clerks of various Scotch burghs. An allocation was made of the £100 among the various offices or duties which were covered under the general term of town-clerk. I suppose that this allocation was thought to be necessary for the accurate statement of the burgh accounts. It appears that the town-clerk was far from satisfied either with the amount of the salary fixed or with the allocation of it, and he laid before the Magistrates a long memorandum on the subject; but he undertook the office and entered on its duties.

"When the Act extending the burgh was passed on 18th November 1902 the pursuer became town-clerk of the extended burgh without any express appointment to that effect; and I apprehend that he was so necessarily, unless he resigned all connection with the town-clerkship of Wick. He could not possibly have claimed to be town-clerk of the old burgh of Wick (which had ceased to exist) and refused to undertake the duties of town-clerk of the extended burgh. In truth he merely continued in the office of town-clerk of the burgh which he held by permanent tenure.

"It does not appear that when the Act was being carried through he took any steps to secure any provision for his salary. He allowed the Act to pass, fixing on him the position of town-clerk of the enlarged burgh with all its duties, trusting, I suppose, to the liberality of the Magistrates."

After the Act came into operation the town-council fixed the salary of the town-clerk at £120 a year. The pursuer then brought the present action.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 7) "Subsequent to the amalgamation of the two burghs . . . the town-council, by minute dated 3d August 1903, resolved to fix the pursuer's salary at the sum of £120 for the duties devolving upon him as town-clerk under the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900. The said sum is totally inadequate remuneration for the amount of work required since the extension of the burgh, and is so unreasonably small that it is an attempt to force the pursuer to give up the office of town-clerk by making it not worth his while to retain it. The defenders are thus endeavouring to impose upon the pursuer conditions inconsistent with the due discharge of his duties, and to force his resignation of an office he holds for life. . . . It is believed and averred that the resolution of the Town-Council to fix the pursuer's salary at the figure above mentioned was not a bona fide exercise of the powers intrusted to them, and was not arrived at on a fair consideration of the circumstances, but it was engineered for purposes and arrived at on considerations quite foreign to a fair exercise of the defenders' discretion. The said resolution was brought about through the exertions of three members of the Town-Council, viz.," Messrs Alexander Rae, Ernest Buik, and George Jamieson Ross, "who had conceived feelings of ill-will and animosity against the pursuer in connection with matters quite foreign to the pursuer's duties as town-clerk. The said members avowedly entered the Town-Council for the purpose of paying off their private grudge against the pursuer. From the time they were elected they set about doing so, and they did not rest until they accomplished their aim. They unduly influenced the other members, and under the guise of public duty they attacked the pursuer, and persuaded their fellow-members to fix the pursuer's salary at the figure above stated. The said resolution was the result of a preconceived scheme to make a personal attack upon the pursuer with the object of gratifying the vindictive feelings of the said members. In these circumstances the offer of the Town-Council is entirely disproportionate to the services required by them from the pursuer, and the said resolution is also nimious and oppressive. It was not arrived at in the impartial or bona fide discharge of the defenders' duties, but amounts to an attempt to deprive the pursuer of his office by imposing impossible conditions upon the performance of his duties."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders being bound to provide for the pursuer, as town-clerk foresaid, reasonable and suitable remuneration, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) The defenders having failed to fix a reasonable and suitable remuneration for the pursuer as town-clerk foresaid, the pursuer is entitled to have the same fixed by the Court, and to decree in terms of the second conclusion of the summons, with expenses. (3) The resolution of the defenders fixing the pursuer's salary not being a bona fide exercise of the defenders' powers, the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The action is incompetent, et separatim, is irrelevant. (3) The pursuer's salary as town-clerk of Wick having been fixed by the defenders after full consideration of the whole facts and circumstances, and in the deliberate exercise of their discretionary right and duty, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (4) The salary fixed by the defenders being reasonable and suitable remuneration for the duties devolving upon pursuer, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 28th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the pursuer was town-clerk of the burgh of Wick before the enlargement of its boundaries by the inclusion of the burgh of Pulteneytown by Act dated 18th November 1902: (2) That he is town-clerk of the burgh as extended by that Act: (3) That the pursuer's salary as town-clerk of the burgh as enlarged was fixed at £120 by resolution of the Magistrates dated 3d August 1903: (4) That there is no relevant averment that in coming to that resolution the defenders acted corruptly and not in the due exercise of their powers under the Act 63 and 64 Vict. c. 49, sec. 78: (5) That no relevant ground is stated for refusing effect to that resolution: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative above quoted)—When the Act came into operation the Magistrates took into consideration the salaries of the various officials, including the salary of the town-clerk. They seem to have considered the subject carefully, and so far as the minutes shew, impartially and fairly. I find nothing in the minutes to indicate the reverse, and they fixed the salary of the town-clerk at £120. I observe that there was a division in the Council on this point, a minority being for £140.

"The pursuer, who had thought the salary of £100 fixed in 1897 inadequate, was greatly dissatisfied with the addition to it, which he thought quite insufficient, seeing, as he says, that the population and valuation of the extended burgh were more than double those of the old burgh; and he has brought this action, which contains two conclusions of declarator, the former a general conclusion that the defenders are bound to pay the pursuer as town-clerk 'a reasonable and suitable remuneration' for his services; the other that they are bound to pay him £280 per annum, 'or such other sum as our said Lords may find to be reasonable and suitable remuneration.' The pursuer's whole case seems embodied in his second conclusion, and the first appears to be superfluous.

"The pursuer's pleas are"—(His Lordship quoted the pursuer's first and second, and the defenders' third and fourth pleas).

"This is not an action for remuneration for services rendered founded either on contract or on the principle of quantum meruit, although it is true that the conclusions go back to the date of the Act. It is an action asking the Court to fix the pursuer's salary, to order payment of that amount for the years byegone, and also, and chiefly, to determine his right to it in future. If the pursuer were on the footing of an ordinary servant or clerk or other official, it is quite obvious that he could have no action. He could only claim a salary on contract; and if he did not choose to accept the salary offered his action would necessarily fail, unless he claimed a quantum meruit for the years byegone, which is not the nature of this action at all. I suppose that none of the other servants hired and paid by the Magistrates could raise such an action. If dissatisfied with their wage they could do nothing but decline the appointment.

"But the question raised in this case depends on the circumstance that the pursuer is not in the position of an ordinary servant, subject to dismissal at the defenders' pleasure. He contends, and I think rightly, that his office of town-clerk is a munus publicum, and that he is not answerable to the magistrates as a servant is to his master or a clerk to his employer. He maintains that he is a state official, and that he holds his office by a permanent tenure, and is not liable to dismissal by the Magistrates.

"This is an important question, but I cannot but think it not open to doubt. The relation between town-clerks and Magistrates is regulated in the first place by section 78 of the Town-Councils Act, 1900, 63 and 64 Vict. c. 49, which provides 'that the Council shall from time to time appoint a fit person to be town-clerk of the burgh,' and that in the case of royal burghs 'the tenure of office' (when not regulated by local Act) 'shall be the same as the tenure of the office of town-clerk in such burghs respectively according to the existing law.'

"This is a reference to common law, and the pursuer contends that at common law the tenure of the office of town-clerks is permanent, and that

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer held his office ad vitam aut culpam.[1] To impose serious extra duties without corresponding remuneration was practically equivalent to dismissing him, and not for culpa, since he would be obliged to resign. Further, magistrates had no power to reduce a town-clerk's salary;[2] but to impose extra duties without additional remuneration was just the same thing as reducing his salary. The defenders were practically trying to get the work of two town-clerks done for the salary of one. The pursuer's averments of mala fides on the part of the defenders were relevant to be admitted to probation.

The nature of the arguments for the defenders sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord Justice-Clerk.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer was town-clerk of Wick, and as such is now town-clerk of the extended burgh of Wick, which includes Pulteneyhe holds it ad vitam aut culpam, and is not subject to dismissal by the Magistrates. On this point the pursuer cited Simpson v. Tod, June 1824, 3 S. D. 150; Farish v. Magistrates of Annan, 1836, 15 S. D. 107, aff. 14th July 1837, 2 S. and M'L. 930; Magistrates of Rothesay v. Carse, 31st January 1903, 5 F. 383; Board of Supervision v. Parochial Board of Old Monkland, 17th January 1880, 7 R. 469, per Lord President and Lord Deas, 473.

"I need not refer to these authorities at length, because I do not think the point open to doubt. I think it was not disputed, and I think it clear that the pursuer holds the present office ad vitam aut culpam. He may resign, no doubt, if he chooses, and so bring his office to an end, but he cannot be dismissed.

"The position of the pursuer is, no doubt, somewhat peculiar. Just before the Act passed he held the office of town-clerk of the old burgh of Wick. It might be argued that when the Act was passed that office came to an end by the act of the Legislature; but I am of opinion that that was not so, and that the pursuer's office never came to an end, but that the burgh of Wick was enlarged, and the duties of the town-clerk were continued and extended over the new boundaries.

"The pursuer contends that the principle that a town-clerk cannot be dismissed by the Magistrates involves the consequence that his salary cannot be reduced. He cited, among other cases, the Magistrates of Dundee v. Kerr, 1833, 12 S. 173; and Downie v. Magistrates of Annan, 7th January 1871, 6 R. 457, which seem to afford some support to that contention. The latter case is difficult to follow, as the judgment seems to decide a point which was not in the case. I do not find it necessary to decide that point, because here there was no reduction of the pursuer's salary, but an addition to it, said, no doubt, to be inadequate. But the pursuer further contends that the permanence of his tenure of office involves the further consequence that the conditions of it cannot be altered town. This action takes the form of a declarator that the defenders, the Magistrates and Town-Council of the burgh of Wick, (1) are bound and obliged to provide for and to pay to the pursuer as town-clerk of the burgh of Wick a reasonable and suitable remuneration for his services as town-clerk foresaid; and (2) that the defenders are bound and obliged to make payment to the pursuer, as town-clerk foresaid, of the sum of £280 sterling per annum, or such other sum as the Court may find to be reasonable and suitable remuneration. Now, Mr Salvesen in the course of his address made it plain that he did not press the proposition upon the declarator at all, but that he based his case upon the petitory conclusion that the Magistrates and Council of Wick were bound to pay to the town-clerk such a salary as this Court shall think adequate. I know of no precedent whatever for such procedure. The Town-Council when appointing a town-clerk offer him such a salary as they think adequate and sufficient for the duties, and if

to his disadvantage. He argues that to increase the duties is just an indirect way of reducing the salary. I am not prepared to assent to that argument, for which, I think, no authority was adduced. I cannot see that the duties of the office of a town-clerk could be accurately and finally defined when he was appointed. The salary might be, but not the duties. The duties of the office of town-clerk are essentially liable to change from various causes; by extension of the boundaries of the burgh, and by the imposition of various duties connected with the municipal and local government, as is well illustrated by the various heads and divisions in which the salary of the town-clerk in this case was subdivided. I think it was never heard of that on every alteration of the boundaries of a burgh the salary of the town-clerk would necessarily be altered. No authority to that effect was produced; and if in this case the pursuer's salary had not been increased at all, I do not perceive any legal ground on which an increase of the salary could have been enforced. I agree that a town-clerk is a public officer, and that he holds an independent position. But I think that so long as he holds that public office he must fulfil all the duties with which the Legislature thinks fit to burden it; and if, as in this case, the duties of a town-clerk are increased by Act of Parliament which does not provide for an increase of his salary, I do not see that the magistrates of a burgh can be compelled to increase it.

"In this case, however, they have increased his salary, and the pursuer argues that the increase ought to have been greater. Perhaps it should; I do not know. The local authorities, I take it, must be the judges. I think that is a matter which the law has entrusted to the discretion of the local authorities; and, so long as they exercise that discretion honestly I think the Court has no duty to interfere. If they should be held entitled and bound to interfere in this case they might be called on to adjust the salaries of all public servants in the country. But that is a duty which the law has entrusted to the local authorities, or has left to be adjusted by mutual contract.

"Therefore, upon the general law of the case, I am of opinion that the Court has no power, or at least no duty, to interfere in this case.

"But the pursuer raises a point of a totally different kind; for he pleads that, assuming the Magistrates have power to fix his salary, they have not exercised their power honestly. Now, if there be a relevant averment of corruption by magistrates in the exercise of their duties, I am not prepared to say that that might not be made the subject of inquiry. But if that were so, one would have expected conclusions of reduction. But I am of opinion that the averments of the pursuer are wholly irrelevant. What is averred is that three of the members of the Council entertained feelings of animosity towards the pursuer and avowedly 'entered the Town-Council for those who are candidates for the office do not think such salary sufficient they are under no obligation to accept the office. If at any time in the course of his fulfilment of the duties of the office he thinks the duties of that office have increased upon him to such an extent that his salary is inadequate, he may apply for an increase, and it is in the discretion of the Magistrates and Town-Council to decide whether the duties which he is doing call for that increase or not. If they do not think so, the town-clerk has simply to consider whether he will remain at the salary as it is, or whether he will retire.

I do not consider that this question is affected at all by the fact, which is no doubt true, that the town-clerk is a public official and holds his office ad vitam aut culpam. That simply results in this, that whatever salary is fixed for him, either at first or from time to time by additions, cannot be cut down so long as he remains town-clerk without his consent. Therefore he has a fixed position and a right to receive that salary as long as the performance of these duties is to the satisfaction of the Magistrates and Town-Council. But it is a totally different thing when he demands a rise of salary. There cannot be the slightest doubt that there are a great many duties which have been imposed upon public officials by Act of Parliament, which have added largely to the duties they have to do, and in some places the Act of Parliament has ordained that the putting of these additional duties upon him shall give him a right to a reasonable increase of salary. But then there are other Acts of Parliament which have not introduced that matter at all, and in regard to these it has been held by this Court that the town-clerk had no claim for an additional salary notwithstanding the purpose of paying off their private grudge against the pursuer.' What the reasons of their supposed animosity and grudge were is not explained. I think that averment is irrelevant on account of its vagueness and want of meaning. Then it is said that these three individuals persuaded their fellow-members to fix the pursuer's salary at the low rate agreed to, but it is not said what the nature of the persuasion was, and in particular it is not averred that they bribed or endeavoured to bribe their brother councillors, or that anything which they told them was untrue or was defamatory of the pursuer. If all that is meant was that the other councillors yielded to the bad arguments of the three who are complained of, it would be absurd to contend that on that account the resolution of the Magistrates should not receive effect.

"It is not pretended that the resolution of the Magistrates could be reduced on the ground that three of them were hostile to the pursuer, or on the ground that all of them were so, and accordingly there are no conclusions of reduction. But if a resolution of a public body, like the magistrates of a burgh, cannot be reduced, it must surely follow that it must receive effect.

"I am not disposed to doubt that the work thrown on the pursuer will be much increased. How much I do not know, and I would not have been surprised had the Magistrates been more liberal in adding to his salary; but my opinion is that they are the proper judges, and that their decision must receive effect if it was fairly and honestly arrived at, which of course it must be presumed to have been.

"For these reasons I am of opinion that there is no relevant averment of corruption or failure of duty by the Magistrates in performing the duty of fixing the town-clerk's salary, that no relevant grounds are stated for refusing effect to their decision, and that they must be assoilzied."

the increase of his duties. Now, in this particular case it is not the ordinary mere extension of a burgh by the taking in of certain outlying districts, or by the increase of the population and the work to be done within the existing district. The only peculiarity about it is this, that instead of absorbing what was before a mere outlying part of the country to which the burgh development had extended, it was in this case the actual absorption of a burgh itself. That is nothing new. Glasgow, I think if I remember right, some fifteen or sixteen years ago absorbed a number of parasitical burghs into the city, and I do not think it makes any practical difference whether the district absorbed has been a burgh before or simply an area with no burghal character at all. The question therefore comes to be, whether we can interfere with the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Wick, in the discretion which they have exercised, in saying that the salary of the town-clerk, which was formerly £100, shall only be increased by £20. We are told that that is not really the actual state of matters. Whereas formerly for his £100 he had to do the duties of law-agent as well without further remuneration—now he gets his salary of £120, and for the law business which he is asked to do he charges the ordinary fees. But whether that is so or not, the Provost, Magistrates, and Council were entitled to consider the matter, and dispose of it, as to whether the town-clerk should get an increase, and what increase they should give. I think the Lord Ordinary arrived at a right decision in holding that there is no relevant case stated here to entitle the pursuer to succeed.

I will only say this further, and it is a matter that should be dealt with, that I could quite well conceive a case where corruptly the municipality might do what they were not entitled to do in a matter of this kind. If it could be averred sufficiently that they acted, not in the exercise and discharge of their duty, but in the exercise of a malignant desire to injure, then possibly that would open a case which this Court would deal with, but we could only deal with it in the sense of setting aside something that had been done and calling upon the Town-Council to do their duty. But it is very difficult to conceive that such a case could arise in which the Court could be called upon to interfere. I do not think the Court can be called upon to interfere, and consider and fix what salary shall be paid by the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Wick to their town-clerk. I therefore move your Lordships that we adhere to the Lord Ordinary's decision.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I assent to all the observations which your Lordship has made.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I also concur. Extreme cases could be figured, but these must be dealt with when they arise. I agree with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships that the pursuer here has stated no case relevant and sufficient to justify the interference of the Court.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

Reparation—Relevancy—Contributory Negligence—Lift in Hotel—Want of light.—In an action of damages by a mother, against hotelkeepers for the death of her son, a commercial traveller, who was killed by stepping into and falling down the well of a lift in the hotel on the night of his arrival, the pursuer averred that the lift was not provided with the usual appliances to prevent persons from entering the well when the lift was not in position, that it was "the universal practice in all lifts to guard the entrance to them by a collapsible lattice door, which can be opened only when the cage is in position to receive passengers." "Thus the deceased on the door being opened was entitled to rely on the cage being in position for him to step into with safety"; that the entrance to the lift was not sufficiently lighted; that there was no light in the lift itself; that no warning was given by the waiter when he opened the door of the lift that the lift was not in position; that the deceased stepped through the door and fell into the well.

Held (1) that the action contained relevant averments of negligence on the part of the defenders, and (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Low), that the pursuer's averments did not necessarily infer negligence on the part of the deceased, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 16th June 1904, Mrs Flora Clark or Greenlees raised an action against the Royal Hotel, Dundee, Limited, in which she claimed £1000 damages for the death of her son, William Greenlees, commercial traveller, 1055 Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, who died of injuries received from falling into the well of a lift in the defenders' hotel.

The pursuer averred that the lift, which was worked by hydraulic pressure, was intended for the use of visitors to the hotel. (Cond. 2) "Access to the lift is obtained through collapsible doors on each landing, which are kept locked, and which in order to be opened require to be slid from the right hand side of the lift (looking towards it) to the left. When not in use the cage sinks to or is left at the bottom of the well on the basement, and has to be brought up to the floor at which it is required. This is done by pulling a rope running within the lift on the left hand side as one enters it, this bringing the hydraulic pressure into play. Before the said rope can be reached by an attendant standing on any of the landings the said collapsible door must be thrown wide open. There is no light in the said well, and an electric light which is provided inside the cage can only be switched on by the attendant after he has entered the cage." (Cond. 3) "The defenders do not employ a regular attendant to remain in and work the lift. It is attended to by the boots and by the waiters in the hotel. The servants who are deputed from time to time to attend to the lift have other duties to perform in the service of the hotel, and are unskilled in the working of lifts, and incompetent to have charge of a lift." (Cond. 4) "The said deceased William Greenlees arrived at the defenders' hotel on the evening of Friday, 8th April 1904, and engaged a bedroom for the night. He had not previously resided in the hotel, and was not acquainted with the premises." (Cond. 5) "About midnight, or shortly thereafter, the said deceased William Greenlees proceeded to the entrance to the lift on the first floor in order that he might be taken up to his bedroom in one of the upper storeys. At his request to be taken up, a waiter named William Spill, who had a key for the lift, attended to him. Spill unlocked and slid open the collapsible door, and pulled the rope with the intention of raising the cage from the basement to the level of the floor on which they were standing. There was no light in the well, and to one standing at the entrance to the lift the well was obscure. Greenlees received no warning from Spill that the cage was not in position to receive passengers, and seeing the gate thrown back he assumed, as he was entitled to do, that it had been opened to admit him to the cage. He accordingly stepped forward, and fell downwards into the well, until he met the roof of the cage, which was but a few feet below the level of the floor on which he had been standing." [The pursuer than set forth the way in which her son received the injuries from which he died.] (Cond. 6) "The said accident, and the consequent death of the said William Greenlees, were solely due to the culpable fault and negligence of the defenders, or of those in their employment, and for whom they are responsible . . . in respect that the said entrance to the lift was not sufficiently lighted. No light of any kind was provided in the interior of the lift, and the lighting of the hall near it was not sufficient to allow anyone, and specially one to whom the arrangements of the hotel were entirely novel and unknown, to observe that the lift was not in its place when he stepped into the well. It was absolutely necessary for the safety of guests and members of the public having occasion to use the lift to have light either in the well or in the hall sufficient to reveal the said danger, but this the defenders failed to have, with the result foresaid." (Cond. 7) "Further, the rope in the well by which the lift was worked was on the left hand side of the attendant as he stood facing the lift, and could not be reached by him without opening the gate, the effect of which was that before touching the rope he had to throw the gate wide open. It is the universal practice in all lifts to guard the entrance to them by a collapsible lattice door, which can be opened only when the cage is in position to receive passengers. Further, it is the universal practice in the construction of such lifts to place the elevating rope at the side from which the door opens so that the door may be kept so far closed as entirely to prevent the entrance of passengers until the cage is in place. Thus the deceased on the door being opened was entitled to rely on the cage being in position for him to step into with safety. If the rope had been, as it ought to have been, on the other side of the well (unless a regular attendant was to be employed, whose duty it was to remain inside when working the lift), or if the said door had been made to open in the other direction, the attendant could have raised the cage to the level on which he was standing by merely throwing open the door a few inches, and it would then not have been possible for any visitor intending to use the lift to step through the entrance to the lift before the cage was in its proper position." (Cond. 8) "Further, it was the defenders' duty to have employed an attendant skilled in the working of lifts and the care of passengers travelling in them to work the said lift. Had the defenders employed a proper lift attendant the gate would not on the occasion in question have been left unguarded by him until the cage was in a position to receive passengers. It was gross carelessness on the part of the said attendant to open the gate when the light was insufficient as aforesaid without warning the deceased that the lift was not in position, and his said carelessness caused the said William Greenlees' death. The said William Spill was a waiter in the defenders' employment, and not a lift attendant sufficiently skilled in working a lift and in the duty of looking after the safety of lift passengers." (Cond. 9) "The said William Spill, for whom the defenders are responsible, was in fault (a) in opening the gate of the lift in such a manner as to leave the shaft unguarded, and (b) in failing to give the deceased warning when he opened said gate that the cage was not in its proper position. He gave no warning of any kind to the deceased. But for his negligence in not giving warning the accident would not have occurred."

The defenders denied that they were in fault, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The death of the pursuer's son having been caused or materially contributed to by his own fault, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The issue proposed was in ordinary form.

On 17th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) disallowed the issue proposed for the pursuer, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had dismissed the action on the ground that the pursuer's averments disclosed a case of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. It was for the jury to say whether there had been contributory negligence, and at anyrate it could not here be inferred from the pursuer's averments. Various grounds of fault were alleged against the defenders, and the pursuer's averments when read together were relevant.

Argued for the defenders;—The construction of the lift was quite usual, and there was no duty on the defenders to light the well of the lift or to warn the deceased. The pursuer's averments were not relevant, and they shewed that the deceased had stepped into the well of the lift without exercising ordinary care.[1]

Lord Adam.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of Lord Low, in which he has found, in a case of damages for death caused by an accident, that the pursuer has set forth no issuable matter, and has dismissed the action. The action is brought by the mother of a Mr Greenlees, a commercial traveller, who was a guest at the Royal Hotel, Dundee, on 8th April 1904. He arrived at the hotel in the evening, and had never been there before. He was given a bedroom in the upper part of the house, and on returning to the hotel about midnight desired to go up in the lift. It appears that there is no regular lift attendant, but the work is shared by several servants, but no point is made by the pursuer of this fact. It appears that there was no light in the well of the lift, and as the lift itself was not in constant use there was no permanent light in the cage, but after the lift had been brought to the floor, where it was required, the attendant in order to switch on the light in the cage had to throw the door of the opening to the lift wide open. It is also said that the light in the hall was not sufficient to allow Mr Greenlees to see clearly the entrance to the lift. On the occasion in question one of the hotel servants, named Spill, accompanied Mr Greenlees to the lift, and threw the door wide open in order to reach the rope to bring up the lift, and when the lift was within a few feet of the floor level Mr Greenlees stepped forward and fell down on to the top of the cage which was then in motion, and was so injured between the cage and the walls of the well that he died.

The question is whether these averments infer any negligence on the part of the defenders. Perhaps the most material averment is in cond. 5, where it is stated,—"Spill unlocked and slid open the collapsible door, and pulled the rope with the intention of raising the cage from the basement to the level of the floor on which they were standing. There was no light in the well, and to one standing at the entrance to the lift the well was obscure. Greenlees received no warning from Spill that the cage was not in position to receive passengers, and seeing the gate thrown back he assumed, as he was entitled to do, that it had been opened to admit him to the cage." The case put forward is therefore one of a stranger who, wanting to use the lift, and seeing the door thrown open without any warning from the attendant, steps forward and falls down the well. That appears to me to be a case which should go to a jury. I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and that we should allow an issue.

LORD M'LAREN.—I gathered from the arguments of counsel that the Lord Ordinary in disallowing an issue and dismissing the action proceeded upon the ground that facts were admitted on the part of the pursuer sufficient to shew that the deceased met his death through his own negligence or contributory negligence. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary has, however, been supported before us on the ground that no relevant averment of negligence on the part of the defenders is contained in the record. I need say no more on the first question, except that I think the pursuer's averments strongly suggest that this traveller had not taken the usual precautions for his safety, but I do not think they can be construed as an admission of negligence on the part of the deceased.

As to the relevancy of the averments of negligence on the part of the proprietors of the hotel, the case raised on record is alternative. Either the lift, which appears to have been of old-fashioned construction, should have been provided with automatic arrangements for the safety of visitors to the hotel, or it was the duty of the attendant to warn visitors when the lift cage was not in position, because people who are accustomed to automatic arrangements are very apt to trust to them. I think the averments made are sufficient to entitle the pursuer to have the question as to whether there was negligence on the part of the proprietors submitted to a jury.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur with your Lordships. The case may be a difficult one for the pursuer to prove, particularly in view of the fact that the poor man is dead, but I think her averments are relevant. They are founded partly on the want of lighting, partly on the peculiar construction of the lift, and partly on the absence of any warning by the

No. 66. attendant. It is thus a composite case of fault, and I agree that it should go to a jury.

Moyes v. William Dixon, Limited.

LILY MOYES, Appellant.—Watt, K.C.—W. Thomson.
WILLIAM DIXON, LIMITED, Respondents.—Salvesen, K.C.—Hunter.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), section 7, subsection (2)—Dependants.—A workman's daughter, who had previously been earning wages, after her mother's death remained at home to keep her father's house, getting from him board, lodging, and clothing, but no wages. The workman was killed by accident in the course of his employment.

Held that the daughter was a dependant of the workman in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, Lily Moyes, 4 Govan Pit, Glasgow Road, Rutherglen, claimed compensation for the death of her father from William Dixon, Limited, iron and coal masters, Glasgow.

The Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) found the following facts admitted or proved:

"(1) That James Moyes, the father of the appellant, was a waggoner in the employment of the respondents. (2) That the said James Moyes, while in the course of his employment, was accidentally killed on 11th August 1904. (3) That said employment was one to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, applies. (4) That for the three years prior to his death the earnings of the said James Moyes amounted to £149, 13s. 11d. in money, but he also got the use of a house valued at £4 per annum (making £12 for three years), thus bringing up his total earnings for the three years to £161, 13s. 11d. (5) That at the date of the death of the said James Moyes, the appellant, who was a daughter of the deceased, was a woman of about 25 years of age, in good health. (6) That for some time prior to November 1899 she had been employed at Cathkin Steam Laundry, earning 9s. a week, and lived with her father and mother. (7) That her mother having died in November 1899, the appellant ceased going to the laundry, and remained at home keeping house for her father. (8) That she received no money wage, but had board and lodging and clothing free."

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute found that the claimant not having been a dependant of the deceased James Moyes, at the date of his death, had no claim for compensation and dismissed the application.

The claimant appealed.

In a stated case, which set forth the above facts, the question of law was:—"Was the appellant a 'dependant' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"

Argued for the appellant;—The facts found by the Sheriff-substitute

No. 67.

Moyes v. William Dixon, Limited.

shewed that the appellant was in fact dependent on her father's earnings at the date of his death. She was therefore a "dependant," in the sense of the Act.[1] The question of the appellant's wage-earning capacity was not a relevant consideration in determining her right to compensation.

Argued for the respondents;—The question was one of fact, and had been determined by the Sheriff-substitute.[2] The claimant was really her father's servant, and received support as such. The claimant was quite capable of supporting herself, and the policy of the Act was to compensate only those who had been deprived of their means of support.[3]

LORD ADAM.—This is a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The facts found by the Sheriff disclose that James Moyes, a workman in the employment of the respondents, met with an accident and was killed while in their employment on 11th August 1904. His daughter is the claimant and appellant in this case. The facts found by the Sheriff are very short and very much to the point. [His Lordship quoted the facts as stated in the case.] The inference in law which the Sheriff has drawn from these facts is, that in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act the claimant was not dependent on her father, and is therefore not entitled to compensation under the Act.

The appellant was certainly capable of earning wages of 9s. a week, but in point of fact she ceased to seek out-door labour, and very naturally on her mother's death came back to her father to keep house for him, and continued till the time of his death three or four years afterwards to keep house for him, getting no wages from him, but getting, as in the common case, board and lodging. The question therefore is whether or not a woman in such circumstances was dependent on her father. I confess that it seems to me in point of fact—and it is a question of fact—she was dependent on her father at the date of his death. She was getting no assistance from any source, she was getting board, lodging, and clothing from her father, and in all respects was dependent on him.

It is said that this is not a correct view to take of the facts, because the appellant was capable of earning wages for her own aliment, and it is suggested that the true view of the case is that she was in the position of a servant and entitled to demand wages from her father, and therefore was not dependent on him, but dependent on her own earnings, which her father was due her. I think any consideration of that kind is quite irrelevant, because in my opinion the question is—was the appellant, or was she not, in point of fact dependent on her father at the time of his death? The only conclusion I can arrive at in this case is that she was dependent, and I think we should answer the question to the effect that the appellant was a dependant.

LORD M'LAREN.—Under the Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation

Act it is the function of the Court of Appeal to deal with questions of law determined by the arbitrator and stated in a case. It appears to me that in this case the Sheriff-substitute, the arbitrator, has determined a question of law, because from the findings 1 to 8, which are set forth very clearly in the case, he draws the conclusion that the appellant was not dependent on her father, the deceased James Moyes, in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act. In accordance with our settled practice, wherever there is a substantial question of the construction or application of a clause in the statute, this constitutes matter of law that may properly form the subject of a case to us. I infer from the report of a leading case in the House of Lords, Main Colliery Company v. Davies,[1] that the Lords who heard the case had taken the same view of their functions, because while their Lordships in disposing of the case spoke of the question as a question of fact, whether the party there in question was or was not a dependant, yet they expressed their views fully on various questions that go to establish the relationship of dependence, and came to the conclusion that the relation of dependence did exist in the case. I have therefore no doubt at all that the question whether this young woman was or was not dependent on her father is competently before us under the statute. Now, in considering whether she was dependent I find that under the definition clause of the Act, which is substantially the same for Scotland as for England, the right of compensation is limited to such persons as are entitled to sue for damages "as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." If it had been meant that the right was to be limited to those who were in the position to sue an action for aliment it would have been very easy to say so, or if it had been meant to exclude those who were earning wages for themselves, that again could have been very shortly and definitely expressed in the statute. The right to aliment is a much more limited right than is apparently given under this statute, because a father is not bound to support an able-bodied son who might be earning wages for himself. It is only in cases of sickness or inability to earn a living, it may be from mental inability or want of instruction, that a parent becomes liable in aliment. But the analogy of an alimentary claim is not suggested by anything in the statute—the condition of total or partial dependence upon a man at the time of his death introduces an idea wholly foreign to the common law.

I can see no other construction for this provision except that the ground of liability is, whether the wages of the workman at the time of his death were in fact applied to the maintenance of the person who is making the claim. Now, if that be the true construction of the Act, the appellant in this case has established her claim, and I am unable to see any other criterion, consistent with the language of the statute. I do not say that there may not be exceptional cases, but in the present case, although the woman was no doubt able to earn, and had been in the habit of earning, a small subsistence by doing out-door work, she had come to her father's house to keep his house for him, and that seems to be one of the normal cases where a grown-up child may be dependent on the father. The statute does not limit the case of "dependant" to those who are either minors or infirm, or otherwise incapable—it is a general right with a qualification, and the qualification, in my judgment, is that the deceased person at the time of his death had recognised the claim upon him by giving support out of his earnings.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur. The question here is whether or not, in the words of the Act, the appellant was "wholly or in part dependent on the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." Primarily that is a question of fact, and I think it is to be solved by putting it thus—how was this appellant supported? The answer to that question, which is given in the findings of the Sheriff-substitute, is that she was supported by the earnings of the workman, and in no other way at the time of his death. She had no other source of income whatever. She was dependent for her board, clothing, and lodging entirely on the wages of the workman, her father, with whom she resided, and that being so, I cannot see how it can be said in fact or in law that she was not dependent on the wages of the workman at the time of his death.

I consider it quite irrelevant to inquire whether she could have supported herself. If instead of doing what it was I think her duty to do in the circumstances—staying at home and keeping house for her father—she had gone outside and earned money by her labour, and compelled her father to get a strange woman for his housekeeper, she might have laid past some savings out of her earnings to provide for the future, and I think it would be establishing a very hard precedent, and a precedent that might work very badly in practice, to say that a daughter, who acts as the appellant did here, shall not only lose the opportunity of saving money, but shall have no claim under this Act in respect of her father's death. Mr Hunter seemed to fear that in deciding this case as your Lordships propose to do, a dangerous precedent would be established for holding that any able-bodied son or daughter residing with his or her father, and doing no work whatever, should be entitled to the benefits of this statute. I should say such a case would have to be dealt with in a very special way if it came up for decision, but as matter of actual fact I do not think there is much fear of any such question arising, for I should think it would be a most unusual occurrence for a working man to allow an able-bodied son or daughter to live at home without any good reason for doing so, such as the appellant had, and to sorn on their father for a living. I think the fear expressed on behalf of the respondents here is entirely illusory, and on the facts and the law I entirely agree with your Lordships.

Held that the trustees had a good title to challenge the validity, on the ground of non-compliance with the articles of association, of a special resolution of the Company for voluntary liquidation and the appointment of a liquidator.

Held that at a meeting for the passing of a special resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the Company, there must be at least ten members personally present in terms of art. 61 of the articles of association, and that it was not sufficient that the meeting satisfied the provisions of the Companies Acts as to the passing of special resolutions.

Company—Liquidation—Interdict—Competency.—Question, per Lord Kyllachy, whether a note of suspension and interdict to have the respondent interdicted from acting as liquidator of a company under an ex facie valid special resolution of the Company for voluntary liquidation, and the appointment of the respondent as liquidator, was competent.

2D DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

IN May 1904 the trustees of the late Abram Howling, master mariner, Leith, presented a note of suspension and interdict against A. Davidson Smith, C.A., Edinburgh, and also against the North British Property Investment Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, for any interest they might have, praying to have the respondent Smith interdicted from acting in any way as liquidator, or representing himself to be liquidator, of the North British Property Investment Company, under an alleged resolution of the Company, dated 31st March 1904.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—"The complainers are the trustees and executors of the late Captain Howling, who died in April 1902. He was, at his death, the registered owner of 140 shares, of the nominal value of £10 each, in the North British Property Investment Company, Limited. The executors gave up these shares in their inventory. They also executed a transfer of them in favour of a third party, and sent it in for registration in October 1902; but, after some delay, the directors, acting under a power conferred on them by the articles, declined to accept the transferee. Thus the executors were and remained liable only in their representative capacity under sec. 76 * of the statute, and did not become members of the Company.

* The following sections of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), were referred to by the parties:—

Sec. 51. "A resolution passed by a company under this Act shall be

"The directors had, for some time before Captain Howling's death, been realising the investments with a view to the ultimate winding-up of the Company. The realisation evidently proved much worse than was expected; and ultimately a final call of £1 per share was made, which was duly paid by the executors early in 1903.

"In February 1904 the Company intimated that the surplus funds, after discharging the whole debts and obligations of the Company, admitted of a return of 4s. 3d. per share. This was tendered to the executors, and a formal receipt for £29, 15s. was sent them for signature. They explain that as the receipt bore to discharge the Company of all claims, they declined to sign it until there had been a final meeting of shareholders and a satisfactory accounting made.

"Thereupon the Company issued notices for a meeting to be held on 31st March 1904, to pass a special resolution that the Company be wound up voluntarily, and that Mr Davidson Smith, C.A., be appointed liquidator."

The meeting was held on 31st March 1904 when the special resolution was declared to have been carried, and at a subsequent meeting held on 15th April 1904 the resolution was declared to have been confirmed.

Sec. 82. connection with the liquidation of the Company and the appointment of a liquidator were ten members present. Notwithstanding this the resolution was declared passed and confirmed, and the respondent is acting and claiming to act as liquidator. The said resolution and confirmation are inept, and the respondent has no right to act as liquidator."

The respondent did not deny that ten members were not personally present at either meeting, but he maintained that art. 61 did not apply to any general meeting which had to do with liquidation, and that such meetings were governed by art. 130, which prescribed that the affairs of the Company should on dissolution be wound up in terms of the Acts of Parliament, i.e., in terms of secs. 51 and 129 of the Companies Act, 1862, the provisions of which, the respondent averred, had been observed.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The respondent not having been validly appointed liquidator ought to be interdicted as craved. (2) A quorum of members not having been present when the said resolution was passed and confirmed, the respondent is not entitled to found thereon.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) No relevant case. (3) The note being incompetent should be dismissed. the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the respondent: Recalls the interim interdict formerly granted, dismisses the note of suspension and interdict, and decerns: Finds the respondent entitled to expenses," &c.*

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The complainers although not members of the company were contributories, and as such had a title to see that a liquidation of the company was properly and regularly initiated and carried out.[1] A contributory had a title to petition for the compulsory liquidation of the company.[2] The Lord Ordinary was wrong therefore in sustaining the respondent's plea of no title to sue. (2) The special resolution of 31st March 1904 was invalid in respect that ten members of the company were not personally present at the meeting in terms of article 61 of the articles of association; and for the same reason the confirmatory resolution of 15th April 1904 was also invalid. The respondent averred that these resolutions had been passed in compliance with sections 51 and 126

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative given above)—The sole ground alleged for interdict is, that by article 61 of the Company's articles of association, it is provided that 'no business shall be transacted at any general meeting, except the declaration of a dividend, unless there shall be personally present at the commencement of the business ten or more members, and it is declared that ten members shall at all times form a quorum of the Company,' and it is averred, and not denied, that ten members were not personally present at either of the meetings I have mentioned. The reply made by the respondents is, that article 61 does not apply to any general meeting which has to do with liquidation; that such meetings are governed by article 130, which prescribes that the affairs of the Company shall on dissolution be wound up in terms of the Acts of Parliament—that is, in terms of sections 129 and 51 of the Act of 1862, the provisions of which (it is said) were observed. Looking to the collocation of article 130, with articles 128 and 129, I doubt if it has any application to the present case. But even if it has, the question remains whether article 61 does not also apply to make more stringent the provisions of section 51 of the statute as to the requirements for passing a special resolution. In my opinion it does, and I therefore take the case on the footing that the special resolution was not legally passed.

"The question then comes to be whether the complainers are entitled to state this objection in a process of interdict, in which the bare legal objection is the sole ground of action, and in which, on the one hand, no misfeasance is alleged against any one, and on the other, no loss or damage is said to have accrued to the executry estate held by the complainers. I do not doubt that, if such averments had been made, the complainers would have a sufficient title to sue the wrong-doer, and to obtain redress upon making a relevant averment of breach of duty to them, and of loss accruing from it. They might even have a title to call for an accounting with a view to pecuniary redress. But I am unable to find any good ground in law for sustaining a claim at the instance of persons who are neither members of the Company nor outside creditors to have the liquidation virtually declared null, without any averment whatever of loss or damage. In a case of urgency they might even have been entitled to apply to have the liquidation proceedings stopped until they had an opportunity of constituting their claim. But I have heard no suggestion of that here, and I am of opinion that the complainers' statement discloses no title or interest on their part to demand the remedy which they ask."

of the Companies Act, 1862, and he argued that the resolutions were therefore valid, looking to the terms of article 130 of the articles of association. Article 130 had not that effect. What the result might have been had what was called the "dissolution" of the Company taken place in terms of article 128 it was unnecessary to inquire, because there had never been any extraordinary general meeting of the Company in terms of article 128, and consequently there had not been any "dissolution" of the Company in terms of that article. Article 130 therefore was out of the case. The Company not having proceeded by way of "dissolution" in terms of articles 128, 129, and 130, the liquidation was invalid on that ground; or otherwise these articles were to be treated as if they did not exist, and the question was to be determined in accordance with the ordinary rules of company law. According to these rules it was not enough that the provisions of the Companies Act in regard to meetings had been complied with; there must also be compliance with the provisions of the particular company's articles.[1] (3) It was competent to raise this question by way of interdict; a reduction was not necessary.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—The complainers had no title to raise this question, as they were contributories merely, and not members of the company. A contributory had a title to petition for compulsory liquidation, but that was because section 82 of the Companies Act, 1862, expressly gave contributories such a title. But in the case of voluntary liquidation the Act did not give a corresponding right to contributories merely as such; it was only members of the company who were entitled to vote at meetings for the consideration of resolutions for voluntary liquidation. If indeed a contributory alleged that he had suffered prejudice by illegalities in a voluntary liquidation, he probably would have a title to apply to the Court for redress. But the complainers did not aver that they had suffered any prejudice whatever; they merely averred a bare illegality in the meetings of the Company. That was a matter for the members of the Company, and these alone. (2) These resolutions of 31st March and 15th April had been validly passed. On a sound construction of the articles of association, article 130 had the effect of superseding article 61 quoad liquidation, and of making sections 51 and 126 alone applicable to meetings for the purposes of considering as to liquidation. (3) It was incompetent to interdict a liquidator from proceeding to act under an ex facie valid resolution to wind up voluntarily, but the respondent was willing that the question should be tried in the present process.

Lord Young.—I am clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is wrong. He has sustained the first plea in law for the respondent, viz., no title to sue. He has determined the case simply on the ground that the complainers have no title to be heard. The point that they desire to make is that the special resolution that the Company should be wound up and a certain gentleman appointed liquidator was not legally passed owing to the fact that a quorum of members was not present. The Lord Ordinary apparently thinks the objection a sound one, but is of opinion he cannot hear it from these complainers. I am clearly of opinion that they have a good title to be heard as proprietors of the shares, although not members of the Company. This is the only question we require to determine, although I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the resolution was illegal.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur. I should have been glad to have seen my way to support the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, because I think we see sufficiently behind the scenes to realise that the complainers' interest to raise this question is not of a very substantial character; but the question having to be decided, I am unable to hold otherwise than that these persons being contributories of this Company have a sufficient title to complain that the proceedings which resulted in the appointment of this liquidator were irregular and therefore illegal. That being so, the only question is whether the respondent has succeeded in shewing that, assuming the complainers' title (contrary to the Lord Ordinary's opinion), their objection to the regularity of the proceedings is well founded. As to that I am afraid that the terms of the Company's articles of association are conclusive in the complainers' favour. I do not, I confess, see how, having regard to those articles, any meeting of the Company capable of passing a special resolution for winding up could be legally constituted without the personal presence of at least ten members of the Company.

As to the competency of trying such a question by a process of interdict, I should, if the point had been raised, have had some difficulty. But the respondent's counsel I think very properly stated that they did not take any objection, and were quite willing that the question should be decided in the present process.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: . . . Sustain the first and second pleas in law for the complainers: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondent from acting in any way as liquidator, or representing himself as liquidator, of the North British Property Investment Company, Limited, under an alleged resolution of said Company, dated 31st March 1904, and decern."

the tenendas clause of a feu-charter, dated in 1825, the vassal and his heirs and assignees whomsoever were taken bound to pay a certain feu-duty, "doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir and singular successor." Subinfeudation and holding otherwise than of the granters and their successors were prohibited, and it was provided that all disponees of the vassals after the grantee taking infeftment should be obliged to enter within six months of the dispositions in their favour, and to pay the duplicand for such entry although their author might be then in life, "and in case of their failing or refusing to enter as aforesaid, then the right of the said purchasers or disponees . . . shall be held and considered still to remain with the former vassals, and the said area . . . shall be subject and liable to his debts and deeds notwithstanding the dispositions . . . granted by him."

Held that the superiors had a contractual right to recover a duplicand from a singular successor of the vassal holding under and in terms of the feu-charter, and impliedly entered under a disposition recorded in 1903, although the last vassal who had paid a duplicand was still alive.

A feu-disposition, dated in 1831, provided that the lands were to be holden of and under the superior and his heirs and successors for the yearly payment of a certain feu-duty, "paying two years' feu-duty for the entry of each heir and singular successor (or one year's feu-duty in the event of the vassal last entered with the superior being then alive), over and above the duty for the year." It was declared that the vassal and his heirs and assignees should not be entitled to sell, let, or dispose of the subjects "to be held of themselves or of any interjected superior, but only of and under the superior and his foresaids," and that if the vassal or his heirs and assignees should "act contrary to any of the conditions above expressed," an irritancy should be incurred.

Held that the superiors were entitled to recover a duplicand from a singular successor of the vassal holding under and in terms of the feu-charter, and impliedly entered under a disposition recorded in 1895, although the last vassal who had paid a casualty was still alive.

1st Division.

THIS was a special case presented for the opinion of the Court upon questions between the superiors and the respective vassals of (first) certain heritable subjects at 1 West Claremont Street, Edinburgh, and (second) certain heritable subjects at 4 Middleby Street, Edinburgh.

The parties to the special case were (1) the Church of Scotland and the General Assembly thereof, acting through its Chapels of Ease Endowment Committee, with consent of Sir John Cheyne and others, and of the Right Honourable James Alexander Campbell, LL.D., M.P., and others, as trustees, the superiors of both properties (first parties); (2) Alexander Watson, baker, Edinburgh, and his wife, proprietors of the West Claremont Street subjects (second parties); and (3) John Charles Grieve, teacher of music, Edinburgh, proprietor of the Middleby Street subjects (third party).

I. West Claremont Street subjects.—These subjects were acquired by the second parties by disposition by the said Alexander Watson in their favour, dated 31st July, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 8th August 1903, and were held by them under and in terms of feu-charter granted by Charles Ross, advocate, and others, trust disponees of the deceased James Rose, with consents, in favour of James Sutherland, builder, Edinburgh, dated 23d July, 31st August, and 11th November 1825. This feu-charter also related to other subjects. The superiors' interest in this feu-charter was at the date of the case duly vested in the said Sir John Cheyne and others as trustees.

The clauses in this feu-charter relating to the manner of holding of the subjects were as follows:—"To be holden and to hold All and Whole the said lot or area of ground and tenements to be erected thereon . . . of and under us the said trust disponees, and our heirs and successors, immediate lawful superiors thereof, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever. . . . Paying therefor yearly the said James Sutherland, and his foresaids" (viz., his heirs and assignees), "to us and our foresaids, the sum of £90, 4s. sterling in name of feu-duty. . . . And doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir and singular successor to the premises. And providing always, as it is hereby provided and declared, that it shall not be competent to nor in the power of the said James Sutherland and his foresaids to subfeu, sell, or dispose of all or any part of the foresaid area of ground or tenements to be erected thereon, to be held of them or of any other interjected superior, but to be held allenarly of and under us the said trust disponees and our foresaids, as superiors in all time coming. [Then followed a clause providing that though Sutherland might assign the precept of sasine to a purchaser, yet such purchaser should be bound under pain of nullity to take infeftment thereupon within three months from the date of the disposition in his favour, and that in like manner the heir-at-law of Sutherland, in the event of his dying before himself taking infeftment on or assigning the said precept of sasine, should not be at liberty to assign or convey the same, but should be strictly bound to exhaust the same by taking infeftment thereupon within three months after the death of the said James Sutherland, or otherwise any sasine to be afterwards passed upon the said precept should be null and void.] And it is hereby also provided and declared that all purchasers from or disponees of the vassals in the area before disponed, or any part thereof, after the said James Sutherland and his heir taking infeftment as aforesaid, shall be obliged to enter with us or our foresaids as superiors by charter of resignation, and be infeft therein within six months after the date of the sale or dispositions in their favour, and to pay the composition before stipulated for such entry, and that although their author may be then in life, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, and in case of their failing or refusing to enter as aforesaid, then the right of the said purchasers or disponees of the said subjects shall be held and considered still to remain with the former vassal, and the said area and tenements shall be subject and liable to his debts and deeds notwithstanding the dispositions or other conveyances granted by him. . . . Which whole provisions, conditions, declarations, and conditions contained in these presents are hereby appointed to be engrossed in the instrument or the instruments of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the said area or tenements to be erected thereon, or any part thereof, and if the same shall not be inserted therein, such instruments of sasine and transmission shall be ipso facto void and null, as if the said writing had never been made or granted. . . ."

The parties were agreed that the proportion of the said feu-duty of £90, 4s., and relative duplicand, affecting the subjects No. 1 West Claremont Street was £3, 10s.

The vassal in the subjects 1 West Claremont Street who last paid a duplicand was Robert Dods. The said Robert Dods made payment of £3, 10s. of duplicand on 27th February 1883. The second parties acquired right to the said subjects 1 West Claremont Street from the said Robert Dods by the following writs:—(1) Disposition by the said Robert Dods in favour of the said Alexander Watson, dated 16th April, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 15th May 1903; and (2) the disposition above mentioned by the said Alexander Watson in favour of the second parties. The said Robert Dods was still alive.

The first parties claimed a composition of £3, 10s. from the second parties as due by them in respect of the change of ownership, and their entry to the subjects 1 West Claremont Street.

The second parties maintained that no casualty was at present due, in respect that the vassal who last paid a duplicand was still in life.*

The question of law in the case of the West Claremont Street subjects was:—"(1) Are the first parties, through the said Sir John Cheyne and others, as trustees foresaid, entitled now to recover from the second parties a composition of £3, 10s. although the said Robert Dods remains in life?"

2. Middleby Street subjects.—These subjects were acquired by the third party by disposition by William Richardson, in his favour, dated 14th, and recorded in the Register of Sasines, 28th May 1895, and were held by him under and in terms of feu-right and disposition granted by Robert Bell, advocate, commissioner for George Bell, surgeon in Edinburgh, with consent, in favour of William Bell, W.S., Edinburgh, dated 21st May 1831. This feu-right and disposition also

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), by section 4, subsection (1), abolishes renewal of investiture, and by section 4, subsection (2), enacts that infeftment shall imply entry, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the Register of Sasines, "with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in such lands would according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act have not been defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation."

Sec. 4, subsec. (3), provides as follows:—"Such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties, which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands, at or prior to the date of such entry; and all rights and remedies competent to a superior under the existing law and practice or under the conditions of any feu-right, for recovering, securing, and making effectual such casualties, feu-duties, and arrears, or for irritating the feu ob non solutum canonem, and all the obligations and conditions in the feu-rights prestable to or exigible by the superior, in so far as the same may not have ceased to be operative in consequence of the provisions of this Act or otherwise, shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming; but provided always, that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering."

related to other subjects. The superiors' interest in the said feu-right and disposition was at the date of the case duly vested in the said James Alexander Campbell and others as trustees.

The clauses in this feu-right and disposition relating to the manner of holding of the subjects were as follows:—"In which several subjects hereby disponed, under the declarations and reservations above and after mentioned, I, as commissioner foresaid, with consent foresaid, bind and oblige the said George Bell and his heirs and successors to infeft and seise the said William Bell and his foresaids" (vizt. his heirs and assignees whomsoever) "upon their own charges and expenses, to be holden of and under the said George Bell and his foresaids, immediate lawful superiors thereof, . . . for the yearly payment of the sum of £37, 6s. 6d. of feu-duty, . . . and paying two years' feu-duty for the entry of each heir and singular successor in name of entry-money (or one year's feu-duty in the event of the vassal last entered with the superior being then alive), over and above the duty for the year wherein the entry is made, and interest of the said sum of feu-duty from and after the date of its becoming due and until payment, and a fifth part more in case of not due and punctual payment thereof. . . . And in regard the entry of heirs and singular successors is taxed as above, the said William Bell and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged to infeft himself on these presents within three months of the date hereof. . . . Declaring also that the said William Bell and his foresaids shall not . . . be entitled to sell, let, or dispose of the said subjects . . . to be held of themselves or of any interjected superior, but only of and under the said George Bell and his foresaids in time coming. . . . Declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that if the said William Bell or his foresaids shall act contrary to any of the conditions above expressed, not only shall this feu-right and disposition, with all that may have followed hereon, become void and null, but the person or persons so contravening shall amit and forfeit all right and interest in the foresaid subjects, which shall revert to the said George Bell and his foresaids in like manner as if this feu-right had never been granted; all which conditions, with this irritant and resolutive clause, are hereby appointed to be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future renovations and investitures of the said subjects in favour of heirs and disponees."

The parties were agreed that the proportion of the said feu-duty of £37, 6s. 6d. affecting the subjects 4 Middleby Street was £8, 15s. 6d., and that if any composition was due it amounted to £8, 15s. 6d.

The last vassal in the subjects 4 Middleby Street who paid a casualty was James Dallas. The third party acquired right to the subjects 4 Middleby Street from the said James Dallas by the following writs, viz.:—(1) Factory and commission by the said James Dallas in favour of Mrs Jane Fordyce Rose or Dallas, his mother; (2) disposition by the said Mrs Jane Fordyce Rose or Dallas, as factor and commissioner foresaid, in favour of the said William Richardson, dated 9th, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines, 13th May 1885; and (3) the said disposition by the said William Richardson in favour of the third party, dated and recorded as aforesaid. The said James Dallas was still alive.

The first parties claimed a composition of £8, 15s. 6d. from the third party. Their ground of claim and the contention of the third party in answer were the same as those put forward by the parties in the case of the Claremont Street subjects.

The question of law in the case of the Middleby Street subjects was:—"(2) Are the first parties, through the said James Alexander Campbell and others, as trustees foresaid, entitled now to recover from the third party a composition of £8, 15s. 6d., although the said James Dallas remains in life?"

Argued for the first parties;—1. West Claremont Street subjects.—There was here a clear prohibition against subinfeudation, and an obligation imposed upon singular successors to enter within six months, and to pay a duplicand. There was no express clause of irritancy, but the provision that in case of failure to enter the right should remain with the disponers was equivalent to a clause of irritancy, as it rendered a disponee's title nugatory without entry. The case was therefore ruled by Dick Lauder v. Thornton.[1] The only difference between that case and the present was that in that case there was an express irritancy clause, and here there was not. But an irritancy clause was not essential if there was a clear obligation to enter.[2] Dick Lauder[1] was an example and not the measure of the rule. Apart from that case, however, this case fell under the principles which received effect in Morrison's Trustees v. Webster,[3] and Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee.[4] The obligation to enter and to pay a duplicand was a condition of the holding. It was part of the reddendo, and being a payment of fixed amount it was payable just like a duplicand at a fixed interval, and it was recoverable by a petitory action. The second parties being entered by force of the statute had rendered themselves liable for all the obligations imposed on the vassal by the feu-charter. The superior's right under the law prior to 1874, in such a case as the present, was either (1) to bring an action of reduction improbation, and so compel the proprietor to shew his title and enter or to have decree contra non producta pronounced against him; or (2) to bring a petitory action against the proprietor for payment of the duplicand as part of the reddendo. The superior could, prior to 1874, have compelled payment of the stipulated duplicand, although the last vassal who had paid a duplicand was still in life, and the proviso in section 4 (3) of the Act of 1874 did not apply.[5] The case of Hamilton v. Chassels[6] was distinguishable. There was there no express prohibition of subinfeudation, no irritancy clause, and no clause under the provisions of which entry could have been enforced.

2. Middleby Street subjects.—In this case there was a clear prohibition against subinfeudation, and there was also a clause of irritancy. It was therefore a fortiori of case 1, and in terms fell under the rule laid down in Bell's Commentaries.[7] The case of Dick Lauder[1] directly applied, and under that case or under Morrison's Trustees[3] and Stewart,[4] the question should be answered in accordance with the superiors' contention. The provision that one year's feu-duty should be payable instead of two if the last entered vassal was still alive shewed that the right to demand the duplicand was not dependent upon there being no entered vassal in life. The proviso in section 4 (3) of the 1874 Act[1] did not apply in this case either, and the duplicand was consequently payable now, although the last vassal who had paid a casualty was still alive.

Argued for the second parties;—West Claremont Street subjects.—The first parties were not entitled to recover payment of a duplicand from the second parties while the last vassal who had paid was still in life. The proviso in section 4 (3) of the 1874 Act applied.[1] The duplicand here was not payable "irrespective of entry."[1] It was only payable for an entry. The superior could not have brought a declarator of non-entry, for the fee was full. He had no means of compelling a disponee to enter while the last vassal who had paid a duplicand was alive. There was no irritancy clause. The clause founded on by the first parties was not equivalent to an irritancy clause. It merely expressed the effect in law of an a me disposition prior to confirmation. This case was consequently ruled by Hamilton v. Chassels,[2] and Dick Lauder v. Thornton[3] did not apply. In the absence of an irritancy clause Dick Lauder[3] would have been decided in the opposite way. Under this charter even if a vassal had granted a subfeu the superiors in the absence of an irritancy clause would have been powerless so long as the granter of the subfeu was alive.[4] If the disponee under an a me disposition failed to enter the only thing which under this charter the superior could have done would have been to bring a declarator that the feu belonged to the disponer and not to the disponee. If the disponee chose to be content with a right which was liable to defeat in the event of the disponer's bankruptcy, the superior had no means known to the law by which he could compel the disponee to perfect his right by entry. If the superior had brought a reduction improbation the disponee could have produced the title of the last entered vassal if still in life, and it would have been jus tertii for the superior to object to the disponee occupying the lands without a title if he was there by permission of the last entered vassal if still in life.

Argued for the third parties;—Middleby Street subjects.—The proviso in section 4 (3) of the 1874 Act[1] also applied here, and the duplicand was not payable while the last vassal who had paid was alive. In this case likewise nothing was due till entry. The meaning of the clause providing for payment of one year's feu-duty instead of two if the last entered vassal was still alive was, that if a disponee chose to enter while the last entered vassal was alive he was to get entry on easier terms than if he waited, as he was entitled to do, until the fee ceased to be full. The feu-charter did not stipulate that singular successors should enter with the superior at once or within any specified time. No doubt here there was a clause of irritancy. But there had been no contravention. There had been no subinfeudation and no conveyance with a de me or an a me vel de me holding. Where subinfeudation was prohibited, and the manner of holding was not expressed, the manner of holding must be assumed to be a me. But even if the disposition had been to hold a me vel de me that would not have been a contravention.[1] Even if there had been a contravention and an irritancy had been incurred, the superior's only remedy would have been a declarator of irritancy.[1]

LORD KINNEAR.—This special case is brought for the determination of questions between the first parties as superiors and two different vassals holding separate and distinct estates, and in this respect it is in my opinion irregular in point of form. For by this method of combining two distinct litigations in one special case, each of the vassals is made a party to statements of fact affecting the other with which he himself has no concern, and his concurrence in which is nevertheless made the basis of a judgment inter alios. The two cases may however be separated without difficulty for the purpose of consideration, and as each party is undoubtedly bound by the statements affecting his own case, I think there is no fatal objection to the competency of the proceedings, although it is proper to advert to the irregularity, lest it should be supposed to have been overlooked or to be sanctioned by the Court.

It is necessary, however, to consider the two cases separately. To begin with the first, it is stated that the first parties are the superiors of certain subjects in West Claremont Street, and the second parties are the vassals infeft in these subjects. The vassals' right is constituted by a feu-charter granted in 1825; and they hold by virtue of a disposition granted by a singular successor of the original vassal, dated and recorded in the Register of Sasines in 1903. By the terms of this charter the lands are to be holden of and under the granters and their heirs and successors, immediate lawful superiors thereof, in feu-farm, the grantee and his heirs and assignees paying therefor yearly a certain sum of money in name of feu-duty, with legal interest from the term the same falls due during the not-payment, and doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir and singular successor to the premises, and providing that it shall not be competent to nor in the power of the said grantee and his foresaids to subfeu, sell, or dispose of all or any part of the subjects to be held of them or of any other interjected superiors, but to be held allenarly of and under the granters and their foresaids; and it is also provided that all purchasers from or disponees of the vassals shall be obliged to enter with the superiors by charter of resignation, and be infeft therein within six months after the date of the sale or disposition in their favour, and to pay the composition before stipulated for such entry, and that although their authors may be then in life, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, and in case of their failing or refusing to enter as aforesaid, then the right of the said purchasers or disponees shall be held and considered "still to remain with the former vassal, and the said area and tenements shall be subject and liable to his debts and deeds notwithstanding the dispositions or other conveyances granted by him." There is a corresponding provision providing for the case of the grantee assigning his right before infeftment. But as no question can now arise as to that, it is unnecessary to quote it. The question depends upon the provisions I have quoted, which were to be engrossed in all future transmissions and investitures, and their meaning and effect is perfectly clear and distinct. Subinfeudation is absolutely prohibited, and the grantee and his heirs and successors have no power to dispone the subjects to be holden otherwise than from the disponer and his heirs and successors of and under their immediate lawful superiors in the same manner as the disponer himself. It follows that the only way in which any disponee or singular successor can obtain a real right in the subjects without violating the conditions of the charter is by taking infeftment immediately of and under the superior, or in other words, by entering with the superior and paying the fine exigible on such entry. Under this charter, then, the second parties now hold the subjects by virtue of a disposition by Robert Dods in favour of Alexander Watson, dated 16th April, and recorded in the Register of Sasines on 15th May 1903, and (2) disposition by Alexander Watson in their favour recorded in August of the same year, and it is stated that the last singular successor who paid a duplicand on entry was Robert Dods, who is still alive. The two dispositions are not before us, but we must assume, because it was assumed in argument, as it is in the special case, that they are regular and correct in point of form, and effectual to carry the lands, subject to the conditions of the original charter; and that by recording them in the Register of Sasines the respective disponees were duly infeft. It is part of the stated case, indeed, on which judgment is invited, that the subjects are held by the second parties "under and in terms of the feu-charter."

In these circumstances the question which has arisen for decision between the parties is whether the superiors are entitled to receive from the second parties the duplicand payable under the charter on the entry of singular successors, the parties being agreed as to the amount of such duplicand if it is payable at all.

At first sight it would seem to me hopeless for the second parties to deny their liability in the face of their admission that they are singular successors, that they are entered with the superior, and that they hold in terms of the charter. The terms of the charter are as plain as words can make them, that the vassals are to pay a certain annual feu-duty, and to pay double that sum on the entry of singular successors. It is beyond all question that they are liable for the feu-duty, because they have taken infeftment in the lands in terms of the charter, and by the same reasoning they must be liable for the duplicand also. The ground of liability is that no one can take benefit under a contract or grant and at the same time refuse to perform the stipulated conditions on which the benefit is given.

But then it is said that the condition on which the duplicand is payable has not emerged, because the second parties have not come forward to demand an entry according to the law in force when the charter was granted, but are only entered by implication of the Statute of 1874. The implied entry must be subject to all the qualifications which the statute has created; and one of these qualifications is that an implied entry "shall not entitle any superior to demand a casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering." Now, it is said that Robert Dods, the last vassal who paid a duplicand, is still in life, and that so long as he lives the superior could not under the old law have brought a declarator of non-entry, because the fee was full, and therefore could not have demanded a casualty. But in the actual state of the titles the life of Robert Dods is altogether irrelevant to the question. The superior has nothing whatever to do with him, and is not concerned to inquire whether he is still in life or not. For Robert Dods is no longer the vassal in the feu. He is absolutely and entirely divested of all right and title in the lands, and the second parties are invested in his room and place. It is true that the fee is full, but only in consequence of the infeftment of the second parties as vassals. The infeftment of the former vassal is evacuated by the infeftment of his disponees, and there is no other infeftment in existence establishing the relation of superior and vassal except that which created that relation between the first and second parties. I agree that the superiors are not in a position to raise a declarator of non-entry, or the statutory action that comes in its place, because the vassals are infeft in the fee, but for the very same reason the vassals are bound to pay the duties stipulated by the feu-charter. It must be kept in view that the constitution of a feu is matter of contract whether the conditions are embodied in a mutual deed or in a unilateral charter; and by the law of contract the vassals cannot be allowed to take the land and refuse to perform the conditions on which it is given. It need hardly be said that the law of tenure coincides in this respect with the law of contract.

The question, however, is whether the right to immediate payment of a duplicand is displaced by the third subsection of the fourth section of the statute. It appeared to me that some confusion was introduced into the argument by an indiscriminate application of the language of this section to very different forms of title. If the word "infeftment" were to be construed in its ordinary technical sense, it would be difficult to apply any part of the enactment to the case of a conveyance with an a me holding. For the main enactment is that every proprietor who is at the commencement of the Act, or thereafter shall be, duly infeft shall be deemed to be entered as at the date of such infeftment; and in the case of an a me holding, infeftment and entry are only two different words for one and the same thing. In such a case therefore the statute would mean that every proprietor duly infeft shall be deemed to be duly infeft, which would be futile. There can, I think, be no question that the form of title primarily contemplated by the fourth section was the a me vel de me holding. The purpose was to simplify the completion of such a title by entering a disponee at once without the intervention of the superior; and at the same time to leave the pecuniary rights of parties undisturbed, by saving on the one hand the superior's right to a casualty on entry, and on the other hand allowing the disponees of an entered vassal to postpone payment, in the same way as if they had taken infeftment for a time under the disponer. The statute therefore postulates the infeftment of the disponee as the condition on which the new regulations for entry are to take effect, and it assumes that the disponee may at will defeat the estate of the superior, under whom he is infeft. This is directly applicable to the case of a proprietor infeft by virtue of a conveyance with a double manner of holding and an indefinite precept. But nobody else can be infeft in lands, and yet be in a position to extinguish the estate of his superior, and come to hold directly of an over-superior. If infeftment therefore is to receive its ordinary signification the enactment has no meaning with reference to an a me holding. A proprietor so infeft is entered already, and no farther entry can be either necessary or possible. But the difficulty seems to be removed, so far as regards the main enactment, by the special meaning assigned to the word by the interpretation clause. For the purposes of the Act, as I read the clause, "infeftment" is made to "include every title to an estate requiring and admitting of infeftment which is duly recorded in the Register of Sasines," irrespective altogether of the condition by which the corresponding definition in the Titles Act of 1868 is qualified, that such registration shall have constituted a real right to lands. If before 1874, therefore, a conveyance were recorded which either expressed, or in terms of the Act of 1868 implied, that the manner of holding should be a me, that would not by the law then in force have been complete infeftment, but only a step towards infeftment which might be perfected by obtaining a writ of confirmation from the superior. But then by the 1874 Act charters and writs of confirmation and other writs by progress are abolished, registration of the conveyance is called infeftment, and the proprietor so described as infeft is entered with the superior. It seems to follow that the only way in which such a title can now be completed is by recording the conveyance in the Register of Sasines, whereupon the disponee will be duly infeft, for entry in the case supposed is just infeftment and nothing more.

But if the positive enactment of section 4 is thus satisfied, the language of the negative proviso at the end of the subsection (3) is still inapposite, because it assumes that a proprietor has been duly infeft under the prior law, but without as yet having entered with the superior, and on that assumption prescribes the conditions on which he is to be entered by force of the statute itself. In applying the proviso, therefore, to a case where infeftment and entry are one and the same thing, we must be careful to see that we do not force language which is certainly inexact, so far as to go beyond the true intent and meaning of the statute, to the prejudice of either superior or vassal. The true purpose of the enactment is not doubtful. It is intended to secure that a superior with whom a vassal has been entered by implication shall not get payment sooner than he would have done so under the prior law. But that is a risk to which a disponee with an a me holding is in no way exposed. If he takes infeftment by registration of his conveyance under the new law, he must pay a casualty, because that is a condition of the title he has chosen to complete. If he had applied for infeftment by writ of confirmation under the old law, he would have been required to pay a casualty as a condition of granting the writ for which he asked. But it is said that under the old law the superior could not have required the vassal to enter so soon, because a former vassal is still in life. Now, it seems to me to be obvious that in order to ascertain the time which is intended by the phrase, "not sooner than he could have required the vassal to enter," the condition must be related to some hypothetical position of the vassal's right, with reference to which the statutory question is to be proposed. And I think the position which the statute itself postulates is that the vassal has a real right. In reading the negative proviso which refers us to the prior law, we must discard the new artificial meaning which the statute gives to "infeftment," and keep in view that by that law the real right which the statute now attaches to the registration of a conveyance could only be obtained by the intervention of the superior. But apart from that consideration, the only hypothesis on which it is reasonable to inquire whether a casualty would have been exigible is that the disponee desires to obtain a substantial right to the land which he has purchased. What is contemplated by the enactment, as I understand it, is the completion of a purchaser's title in accordance with the recognised practice and in the ordinary course of business. And this is in accordance with the view taken by the Court in the cases which have been decided with reference to entry on an alternative holding. In that view the question to be determined is at what time could the superior have required a disponee to enter, who had obtained a conveyance from a vassal infeft, and desired to obtain a real right in the subjects conveyed? And in answering that question, the first thing to be observed is that by "required" the statute cannot mean "compelled by action." For the superior could never at any time in the history of the law have brought an action to have a man ordained to enter as vassal. All that he could do was to resume possession of the land and hold it for his own use, to the exclusion of any one alleging a proprietary right, who did not choose to come forward and enter on the terms fixed by the charter or by the general law. There is no known practice therefore to which the word could refer, if it meant "compel by an action at law." But it is a word of ordinary English, and it does not mean compel. It means demand as of right. And what the superior could have demanded as of right in the case I am supposing does not seem to me to be open to doubt. I think it must be conceded that he could have made no demand at all, so long as a purchaser did nothing to obtain a substantial right to the lands. He had nothing to do with the personal contracts of his vassal, and had no right to see them. But it is not to be supposed that the purchaser would leave the land he had bought open to the debts and deeds of the vendor, and would take no step to make good his own right to it. The reasonable assumption is that he would desire to obtain a real right which would protect him against fraud and against the diligence of the vendor's creditors; and what the superior could require as a condition for giving such a right is fixed and determined by the terms of the charter. In the first place it is required by the charter that the purchaser shall obtain a conveyance which will enable him to take infeftment directly of and under the superior, and will not enable him to infeft himself under the disponer, either by a permanent or by a temporary title; in the second place, that he shall carry out his right by taking infeftment of the superior within six months of the purchase, and shall pay the stipulated entry money whether the last entered vassal is still in life, or not; and lastly, that if he fails to perform these conditions his title shall be treated by the superior as if it were non-existent, and his author shall be considered as the undivested owner of the land, which shall still be subject, notwithstanding the sale, to his debts and deeds. These are the conditions under which alone a disponee could make his title effectual under the old law, as well as under the new law; and it is "under and in terms of" a title expressing these conditions that the second parties assert that they now hold the lands of the superior. It cannot be assumed that if the Act of 1874 had not passed they would not have completed a title which subjected them to such conditions, because no other course was open to them if they were to have any valid title. The disponee of a conveyance to be holden a me vel de me had alternative titles; and when the Legislature interposed to choose for him the alternative which accelerated the superior's claim for a casualty, it was thought reasonable to provide that nevertheless he should not be called upon to pay sooner than if he had been left to take the alternative which, in ordinary circumstances, a disponee in his position would choose for himself. But a disponee with a conveyance in terms of the present charter had no such alternative. His only option was to choose between making up a valid title under the superior and running the risk of losing his land because he had no title whatever. And exactly the same option was open to the second parties under the Act of 1874. It is not open to them to say that they would not have exercised that option in the same way before 1874, because the considerations to determine their option were exactly the same at the earlier as they are now at the later date. There is no change in the title or in the law operating upon the title. The only change is in the form by which the title is completed. I see no reason why the substitution of a new method for completing the feudal relation without altering its legal effect, or the conditions upon which the mutual rights and liabilities come into force, should entitle the vassal to possess and occupy the land without performing the conditions of the investiture by which he holds, and of the contract which he has chosen to make. The superior demands nothing as a consequence of the infeftment which he could not have insisted upon as a condition precedent to his giving infeftment if the methods of the prior law had been still in operation. It appears to me to be irrelevant that the last vassal is still in life, because by the charter under and in terms of which the second parties aver that they hold, a casualty would have become exigible, under the prior law, six months after the purchase just as if the lands had fallen into non-entry by the death of the last vassal.

But if it were necessary, which in my opinion it is not, to establish that the claim could have been enforced by action, I am not disposed to think that under the prior law superiors were so helpless as the vassal's argument supposes. A superior has always been entitled by virtue of his own right in the lands to resume the fief and exclude any occupier who could not shew that he was in possession mediately or immediately by virtue of a grant from the superior himself. This is, as Mr Erskine[1] puts it, "a fixed right of superiority," and for making it effectual the superior may bring an action for having the deeds which are alleged to constitute a right of property judicially exhibited, that their validity and import may be ascertained. The most ancient form of this action, which was called the action for shewing the holding "hath now," says Mr Erskine, "been long laid aside." But he adds that its purposes are fully answered by the more modern action of reduction improbation, by which the superior, setting out his own right to the land, compelled all persons claiming to have a good right under him to produce their titles on pain of nullity. If a title were produced its conditions must be performed. If none were produced the superior had decree of reduction contra non producta.

It may be more material, however, to inquire whether the first parties have a good action for payment, notwithstanding or by virtue of the Act of 1874; and as to that, I see no difficulty. It is true that they cannot make use of the statutory action provided by subsection 4, because it is available only when the lands would have been in non-entry but for the Act, and the second parties are entered because they have taken infeftment. But just because they are infeft, the first parties have a good action to enforce payment of the duplicand, which is part of the reddendo, in terms of the feu-charter. This was decided in Dick Lauder v. Thornton.[1] The superior in that case brought an action with alternative conclusions, the first for decree in terms of the statutory action in room of the declarator of non-entry, and the second for payment of a certain sum in terms of the feu-right. The first was dismissed by the Lord Ordinary, for the reason I have given, but decree for payment was pronounced under the second. I do not find that the Judges in the Inner-House make any observations upon this point, but they adhered without qualification to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and in the later case of Heriot's Hospital v. The Drumsheugh Baths[2] the Lord President said that where a superior has contracted in the feu-charter or feu-contract that a casualty shall be due on change of ownership, that is matter of contract by which the parties are bound, and to give effect to it does not require recourse to subsection 4. "Of this," says his Lordship, "we had recently an instructive example in the case of Dick Lauder,[1] where the action was a common law action to enforce such a contract, and where a casualty of the nature of composition was held to be due, though no legal investiture was required and the fee was full." I am therefore of opinion that the first parties would have had a perfectly good action at common law to enforce payment of the duplicand due to them as matter of contract, if they had not preferred to try the question by means of a special case.

It was maintained that Dick Lauder v. Thornton[1] is in favour of the second parties because the superior's claim there could not have been supported but for a clause of irritancy in the feu-contract. I do not think that case creates any difficulty. It is true that the ground of judgment in the Inner-House was that if the Conveyancing Act of 1874 had not been passed, the superior might have brought a declarator of irritancy and so compelled the vassal to enter or forfeit his right, and that was quite enough for the decision of the case, because it shewed that the superior was not attempting to get payment of a casualty sooner than he could have done so by the prior law. But it does not follow that there is no other way by which that can be shewn; and as I have already pointed out, the importance which the Lord President attached in that case to the element of contract is brought out very clearly in the case of Heriot's Hospital.[1]

The case of Hamilton v. Chassels[2] is not in point, because there was no prohibition of subinfeudation, and that is the ground of judgment explained in the opinion of Lord Adam.

The second parties relied most upon Colquhoun v. Walker,[3] maintaining on the authority of that decision that a purchaser from a vassal who is prohibited from subfeuing or disponing the lands to be held of himself is nevertheless, for the purpose of entering by implication of the statute, exactly in the same position as if his author had been free to subfeu. In that case the feuar sold his land and, notwithstanding the prohibition, gave his purchaser a disposition in the usual form of a conveyance on sale containing an obligation to infeft by two manners of holding—a procuratory of resignation and a precept of sasine. It was held, in an action at the superior's instance, that he was not entitled to reduce both the original feu-contract and the disposition, but without deciding whether he might have reduced the disposition alone. So far as this decision goes, I do not see that the vassal's argument derives any support from it. But the learned Judges held that inasmuch as the conveyance was not intended to create a permanent base right it was not a contravention; and this is said to be in accordance with the doctrine stated by Mr Bell,[4] that when subinfeudation is prohibited, a subfeu-right will be effectual while the right of the vassal stands, although it will fail when it becomes necessary to come to the superior for an entry, which he may refuse and destroy the right by a declarator of non-entry. The Lord President M'Neill goes further, and says that there was no objection to the precept of sasine because there could be "no question that the disponee could have gone to the superior and compelled him to grant a charter of confirmation." This was not necessary for the judgment. But it is the dictum of a very high authority, and its inconsistency with Mr Bell's doctrine may probably be explained by the passing of the Lands Transference Act of 1847 between the date of Mr Bell's work and the date of the decision. Assuming it, however, to be sound law in reference to the case then in hand, I think the present case clearly distinguishable. The charter now before us, as I read it, contains an absolute prohibition not only of subinfeudation, but also of alternative holdings, and for making the latter stipulation more effectual the disponee is required to enter by resignation within six months, and to pay a duplicand although the disponer may be still in life. It may be very probable that after the Lands Transference Act the superior might, notwithstanding the stipulation for entry by resignation, have been required to confirm an infeftment on a precept to be held a me only, because that would, in the words of the statute, have been a more convenient form of entry without being of prejudice to the interests of the superior. But the statute did not compel him to confirm if he could shew cause for refusing to do so; and it would, in my opinion, have been sufficient cause if he could shew that the infeftment was in contravention of the terms of the investiture, and that its recognition would be in the highest degree prejudicial to his interests, inasmuch as it would enable disponees to postpone or evade the payments for which the charter stipulated. Moreover, the prohibition must be repeated in every instrument of sasine; and a superior could not, on any sound principle of law, have been required to confirm an infeftment which bore in terms to have been taken in contravention of the very warrants on which it had proceeded. It appears to me therefore that the first parties and their authors could not have been compelled to confirm an infeftment on an indefinite precept; and it would have been nothing to the purpose to say that the conveyance was not intended to create a permanent base right, because the object of the prohibiting clause was to prevent the creation of temporary rights, and so to compel purchasers and disponees to come forward and pay the stipulated casualty on entry within a certain limited time. I do not know, however, that it is necessary to decide this question, because it is not stated that the second parties or their authors ever held upon an alternative title. The dispositions mentioned in the statement are all subsequent to 1874, and if the manner of holding were expressed, which would be superfluous, it may be assumed to have been a me, because there can be no holding otherwise since the date of the statute. With regard to previous conveyances by the original vassal and his disponees, it must be assumed, since nothing is stated to the contrary in the special case, that they were in accordance with the charter, and therefore must have expressed or, by virtue of the Titles Acts, implied that the holding was directly of and under the superior. But it is said that the question is not what was actually done, but what might have been done if the Act of 1874 had not intervened, and that the case of Colquhoun[1] shews that a purchaser might have obtained a conveyance with an indefinite precept and taken infeftment of the disponer. It is possible that this might have been done if the disponer had agreed to it and the disponee had chosen to run the risk of losing his land by the superior's refusal to enter him when the time came. But I do not think the statute requires us to speculate as to any possible devices for evading the conditions of the feu-right, or as to the chances of their success or failure if they were followed. We are to consider what would have been required to carry out the rights of parties in the ordinary course of conveyancing; and for the reasons already given I am of opinion that a disponee before 1874 must have completed his title by infeftment of and under the superior. I am therefore of opinion that the first question must be answered in the affirmative.

The question between the first and the third parties depends upon the same principles. I do not think it necessary to examine the title of the third parties in detail, because the points of distinction between it and that which we have just considered may be stated in a sentence. The prohibition against subfeuing is substantially the same, and the contingency of entry money becoming payable during the life of the last entered vassal is expressly provided for, but although the original feuar is bound to enter within three months of the date of the feu-right, there is no corresponding condition expressed with reference to his disponees; but, on the other hand, the prohibition is fortified by a clause of irritancy by force of which the disponee may be compelled to enter or to forfeit his right. The clause of irritancy brings this case directly within the authority of Dick Lauder v. Thornton,[1] and that is enough for the decision. I am therefore of opinion that the second question also must be answered in the affirmative.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. LdStormonth-Darling Lord Low.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee for the Middle Ward District of the county of Lanark, held at Hamilton on 13th September 1904, for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, William S. Angus, spirit-merchant, Auchinraith, Blantyre, appealed against the entry in the Valuation-roll of "public-house, Auchinraith," of which Thomas H. Bennett & Company, Limited, spirit-merchants, Glasgow, were entered as proprietors, and the appellant was entered as tenant, at the yearly rent or value of £80.

The appellant craved that the valuation should be reduced to £45, being the rent stipulated in a lease, dated 5th and 7th September 1903, under which the subjects were let by T. H. Bennett & Company, Limited, to the appellant.

The lease, inter alia, bound the appellant "to accept of said subjects as in good tenantable condition and repair, and to maintain them during the currency of this lease, and to leave them at the termination thereof in the like good condition and repair, ordinary tear and wear excepted, and to carry out any alterations or improvements which the licensing authority may from time to time require to be made upon the premises, the proprietors not being in any way bound to execute any improvements or additions to the premises during the currency of this lease, or to contribute towards the cost of any such alterations, improvements or additions, but the proprietors being bound to keep the premises wind and water tight."

Angus v. Assessor for Lanarkshire.

The appellant contended that the lease was a bona fide one, and, having been examined on oath, deponed that he was manager for the firm of T. H. Bennett & Company until September 1903; that he had now no connection with that firm, and was not tied to them in any way; and that there was no consideration other than what appeared in the lease.

The Assessor contended that the stipulation in the lease above quoted imported a consideration other than the rent, and that he was therefore entitled to disregard the lease; that the subjects being let as licensed premises, the obligation upon the appellant to carry out, at his own expense, any improvements ordered by the licensing authority imported an onerous burden upon him, and to that extent relieved his landlords.

The Committee found (first) that the Assessor was entitled to disregard the lease in respect that it contained a consideration other than rent, and (second) that from their own personal knowledge of the lettable value of similar public-houses in the same locality, £60 was the amount at which said subjects might reasonably be expected to let from year to year.

The appellant appealed to the Judges on a case. The case set forth the foregoing facts.

Argued for the appellant;—The stipulations here founded on by the Assessor did not import a consideration other than the rent; they were simply an expression of the tenant's obligation at common law. In considering whether the rent stipulated in the lease was a fair rent for the subjects, the Court would not inquire minutely whether the obligations in the lease exceeded or fell short of the exact obligations of the parties at common law.[1] In any view the proper course was for the Assessor to wait until the alterations had actually been ordered by the licensing authority. It was impossible to say beforehand what the cost of the alterations, if any were ordered, would be.

The Assessor was not called upon.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—Mr Haldane has stated everything possible in favour of this appeal, but I am of opinion that it must be dismissed. The question is whether the Committee are right in disregarding the rent in the actual lease under which the premises are let, and in saying, from their own knowledge of the lettable value of similar public-houses in the same locality, that £60 represents the fair value of the premises. They have thus not adopted the value suggested by the Assessor, which is £80, but have applied their own judgment to the matter. If they are entitled to disregard the lease, there is nothing to be said against the way in which they have exercised their judgment, and therefore the only question for this Court is whether they are entitled to disregard the lease. They have done so because of a stipulation binding the tenant to carry out any alterations or improvements which the licensing authority may from time to time require to be made upon the premises, the proprietors not being in any way bound to execute any improvements or additions to the premises during the currency of the lease, or to contribute towards the cost of any such alterations, improvements, or additions. It is impossible to say that such a stipulation is not of an altogether exceptional kind, and, furthermore, it is altogether indeterminate in amount. If the amount had been determined or determinable the committee would have been justified in spreading the sum so found over the remaining years of the lease, but since the obligation is incapable of being ascertained in money, there is nothing for it but to disregard the lease altogether and to arrive at the value by some other and different means. In this case I think, therefore, that the decision of the Committee should be sustained.

Valuation Acts—Value—Houses in occupation of owner's workmen—Criterion of value—Rent of similar house belonging to same owner let to a tenant—Local knowledge of Valuation Committee.—In 1903 a coal company were the owners of six houses in a burgh, which were in the occupation of workmen in the employment of the company, and were entered in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1904 at the yearly value of £20 each. At Whitsunday 1904 one of the houses had come to be unoccupied, and was in July 1904 advertised to be let at the rent of £14 a year. It was let at that rent to S, a workman who was not in the service of the company, with entry on 18th July 1904. The other five houses which had remained in the occupation of employees of the company, having been entered in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1905 at the yearly value of £20 each, the company appealed, and maintained that the value ought to be £14, on the ground that the let of the house to S at £14 a year, being a bona fide let, formed a good basis of valuation for the houses in the occupation of the company's employees. The six houses were in the same locality and were of the same size. The Magistrates, on a consideration of the facts, and from their own knowledge of the fair letting value of such houses, reduced the valuation from £20 to £17.

Held, in an appeal by the company, that the Magistrates were right, the rent of the house let to S not being a fair criterion of the yearly value of the houses, in respect that the house was let between terms and not after open competition.

Observed that the Court will not disturb valuations reached by a Valuation Court in the light of their own local knowledge, unless there has been an error in principle on their part.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld Stormonth-Darling. Lord Low.

AT a meeting of the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the Burgh of Hamilton, held at Hamilton on 10th September 1904, for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, the Cadzow Coal Company, Limited, appealed against entries in the Valuation-roll of five houses, of which the Company were entered as proprietors and tenants, at the yearly rent or value of £20 each. Case 234.

The Company craved that the yearly rent or value of these houses should be reduced to £14 each.

The following facts appeared from the case on appeal after mentioned:—"The five houses in question, along with a sixth, were built in 1902, and were entered in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1903 at £15 each. In the Roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1904 they were entered at £20 each, all six being occupied by workmen employed in the collieries belonging to the Company. At Whitsunday 1904 five of the houses (being the five in question) remained in the occupation of employees of the Company, and were entered at £20 for the year ending Whitsunday 1905. The sixth house was unoccupied at Whitsunday 1904. On 9th July 1904 the Company advertised it to let in a local newspaper at a rent of £14. William Smellie, joiner, who was not an employee of the Company, was chosen tenant at £14 per annum, and he got the keys on 18th July. The house let to Smellie consisted of three rooms and kitchen with bathroom; the other five houses were similar and in the same part of the burgh. The men occupying five houses paid the Company 10s. 9d. per fortnight, being a total of £13, 19s. 6d. to cover rent and taxes. This sum was retained from their wages. When men left the service of the Company they quitted the houses.

The Company maintained that the let to Smellie, being a bona fide let, formed a good basis of valuation for the other houses occupied by their workmen.

The Assessor maintained that the house let to Smellie could not form the basis of valuation for the other houses, as it was let during the currency of the year and after the usual letting term; that the house was not put into the open market, as the Company had stipulated that the rental would be £14; and that £20 was a fair rental, having regard to the letting value of houses of similar accommodation in the burgh.

The case on appeal set forth that the Magistrates "having heard the agent for the appellants, and also the Assessor, and considered the facts above narrated, and from their own knowledge of the fair letting value of such houses, agreed by a majority to restrict the valuation of the five houses to £17 each, as a fair rent at which the houses might be let, taking one year with another."

The Company appealed on a case.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The question here relates to houses in Hamilton occupied by workmen of the appellants. Six houses belonging to the appellants have been in some recent years entered at £20 a house, but in the present year one house was unoccupied by a workman and was let to an ordinary tenant. The rent got by the appellants was £14, and they now say that the sum of £14 represents a fair criterion of the value of the five houses which are occupied by their workmen. The houses require to be valued on the principle of what they might reasonably be expected to let for from year to year. The Magistrates have not adopted the £20 proposed by the Assessor, but have held that the valuation should be £17 for each house, and they say they have done so from their own knowledge of the letting value of these houses. For that reason, I am not inclined to disturb this valuation. This Court is unwilling to disturb valuations of the Court below which have been come to in the light of their own local knowledge, and only does so where there has been an error in principle on the part of the Magistrates. Here there is no such error. The rent of the house proposed as a test was not the subject of competition in the open market. The appellants advertised the house to let, between terms, at a rent fixed by themselves. Accordingly, the Magistrates have held that the rent obtained from Smellie is not a true criterion of the lettable value of the houses, and I am of opinion that their determination should stand.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. LdStormonth-Darling. Lord Low.

AT a meeting of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, held on 12th September 1904, to dispose of appeals against valuations made by the Burgh Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, The Liverpool, China, and India Tea Company, Limited, and William John Norbray Liddall, advocate, appealed against an entry of "Shop 111 Princes Street," of which Mr Liddall and the Company were entered as proprietor and tenants respectively, at the yearly rent or value of £1036, 12s. Case 233.

The appellants craved that the yearly rent or value should be entered at £902, 10s., of which £900 was the rent stipulated in the lease between the appellants, and £2, 10s. was one-half of the premium of a policy of fire insurance over the subjects which the tenants were taken bound to repay to the landlord.

The Magistrates having refused the appeal, Mr Liddall and the Company took a case.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted by the parties or held by the Magistrates to be proved:—

By lease, dated 29th May and 2d June 1903, Mr Liddall, "in consideration of the rent and other prestations after specified," let to the Company the shop and saloon No. 111 Princes Street, Edinburgh, with the premises below the same, and also the premises in Rose Street Lane, above the back part of the saloon, for the period of twenty-one years from and after the term of Whitsunday 1903, with breaks in the option of the tenants at Whitsunday 1910 and Whitsunday 1917. The yearly rent stipulated to be paid in the lease was:

* Decided March 6, 1905.

No. 72 —For the first seven years (from Whitsunday 1903 to Whitsunday 1910), £900 per annum; during the next seven years (from Whitsunday 1910 to Whitsunday 1917), £1000 per annum; and during the remaining seven years (from Whitsunday 1917 to Whitsunday 1924), £1100 per annum.

Jan. 14, 1905. Liverpool, China, and India Tea Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

The lease, inter alia, provided:—"And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the tenants shall at their own expense fit up the premises hereby let for the purpose of the trade or business of a café or tea rooms to be carried on by them therein and without their having any claim against the landlord for repayment of any part of their outlays either at the termination of this lease or otherwise, and the plans and specifications of the works to be executed by the tenants in altering and fitting up the premises for the purposes of the said trade or business shall be submitted to and approved of in writing by the landlord before any part of the said works shall be proceeded with. But it is hereby agreed that notwithstanding the landlord's approval of the said plans and specifications as aforesaid, the tenants shall take full and sole responsibility for all damage, if any, which their operations in altering the premises to suit their said purposes may cause, and shall compensate the landlord for any such damages as may be done or occasioned to the rest of his property, and shall keep the landlord free of claims for such damages, if any, as may be thereby done or occasioned to adjoining properties belonging to others; and at the termination of this lease the alterations so made by the tenants, including all fixtures, except counters, buffets, counter fittings, screens, electric light fittings, and other tenants' fittings, shall become the property of the landlord."

The tenants were further taken bound at their own expense to keep the inside of the premises in repair, and to paint the same every five years. They were also to keep the roofs and gutters of the saloon, and of the premises in Rose Street Lane, in repair, and to maintain and uphold and renew, if necessary, the glass of the windows of the premises. They were also taken bound to repay to the landlord annually one-half of the premium of a policy of insurance against fire, effected by him over the premises, and that for such sum as he might consider the same to be worth. One-half of the premium amounted to £2, 10s. It was further provided by the lease that in the event of the tenants going into liquidation, or possessing the premises by a manager for creditors, or carrying on in the premises any business other than that before set forth, or assigning the lease, or subletting the premises without the landlord's consent in writing, or leaving any part of the half year's rent unpaid when the next half year's rent should have become due, the lease should, in the option of the landlord, become ipso facto null and void.

By letter of undertaking, dated 30th May 1903, by the Company to Mr Liddall, on the narrative, inter alia, "that on account of opposition the petition to the Dean of Guild Court has had to be amended to the effect of the warrant for the alterations on the premises being granted in your name," and on the further narrative "that the alterations for which warrant has been granted may, in your opinion, render the premises unsuitable for other parties at the termination of our tenancy," the Company bound themselves, inter alia, "at the termination of our tenancy to restore to its present level the ground floor of the front buildings which is being raised 18 inches, if required by you to do so, or to bear the expense of so replacing said floor should we prefer to do so."

The alterations, with a view to fitting up the premises as a café or tea-rooms (including the raising of part of the main street floor), for which warrant had been obtained in the Dean of Guild Court, were thereafter executed by the Company at a cost, exclusive of the cost of moveables, of £2816, 3s.

The Assessor's valuation was made up as follows:—

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Amount of rent as stated in the lease, . . | £900 | 0 | 0 |
| Cost of the alterations, spread over the full period of the lease, viz., £2816, 3s. over twenty-one years, . . . . . | 134 | 2 | 0 |
| One-half of the insurance premium, . . | 2 | 10 | 0 |
| | £1036 | 12 | 0 |

The Magistrates were of opinion—"(1) That if upon a true construction of the lease, and in the circumstances of the case, the tenants were bound to execute the works on which the expenditure of £2816, 3s. had been laid out, which works in the opinion of the Magistrates are of the nature of erections and structural improvements, then such expenditure was a consideration other than rent, and falls to be added to the rent stipulated to be paid under the lease and entered in the Valuation-roll under the provisions of section 6 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854[1] (as has been done by the Assessor); or, alternatively, that if upon a true construction of the lease, and in the circumstances, the tenants were not bound to make the said erections and structural improvements, then the yearly value thereof, which would not be less than the sum of £134, 2s., will fall to be entered in the Valuation-roll as a separate entry under the provisions of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895;[2] (2) that the tenants were bound under the provisions of the lease, and in the circumstances of the case, to make the said erections or structural improvements, and that the making of these erections or structural improvements was a consideration other than rent, and accordingly that the first of said alternatives should be adopted; and (3) that the Assessor had acted correctly in dividing the cost of the said erections or structural improvements by the number of years which the lease had to run, and adding the sum so ascertained to the rent stipulated to be paid under the lease, under the provisions of section 6 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854. They therefore refused the appeal."

Argued for the appellants;—Under the Valuation Act of 1854, sec. 6, where a tenant, without being under any obligation to do so in his lease, put up additional buildings on the subjects let, such buildings were not to enter into computation in calculating the annual value of the subjects for the purpose of entry in the Valuation-roll during the currency of the lease, provided that the lease was a bona fide lease.[3] No doubt, in order that the buildings put up by the tenant should be taken into computation, it was not essential that the tenant should in terms be taken bound in the lease to erect them; a "power" to erect the buildings might, looking to the whole tenor of the lease, really mean an obligation.[1] That principle did not apply here. The alterations made by the tenants did not enhance the value of the subject to the landlord; on the contrary they were a positive disadvantage. They were for the benefit of the tenants only. The Valuation Act of 1895, sec. 4, did not apply to such alterations as those now in question.[2]

The Assessor founded on the undernoted authorities,[3] and maintained that the tenants were truly under an obligation to their landlord to make these alterations; but that if they were not, the Act of 1895, sec. 4, applied.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This appeal relates to premises in Princes Street, Edinburgh, which were formerly occupied as a shop and saloon, but which in 1903 came to be let under the lease which is now before us. The intention of the parties undoubtedly was that the premises should be converted into a café and tea-rooms, and it was also within the contemplation of the parties that these would require considerable structural alteration. Accordingly the purpose for which the lease was granted is set forth very clearly in the lease itself. The leading clause is, "And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the tenants shall at their own expense fit up the premises hereby let for the purpose of the trade or business of a café or tea-rooms to be carried on by them therein, and without their having any claim against the landlord for repayment of any part of their outlays either at the termination of this lease or otherwise." It is also provided that all the alterations made by the tenants, except certain counters and buffets, screens, and electric-light fittings, were to become the property of the landlord at the termination of the lease. The question is whether it was made matter of stipulation between the landlord and the tenants that these alterations were to be made, and I answer that question in the affirmative. If that is the state of the contract between the parties, it is quite settled in Valuation law that the rent stipulated in a lease of that kind cannot be considered as the full and fair rent, because it is clear that a landlord so stipulating would be content to accept a lower rent than he would be disposed to take if he executed the alterations himself. In the present case the Magistrates, following the Assessor, have thought it proper to divide the cost of the alterations over the remaining years of this twenty-one years' lease. I see no objection to that course, and accordingly it seems to me, on the whole matter, that we must affirm the decision of the Magistrates and approve of the Assessor's entry.

LORD LOW.—I confess that at first I felt considerable difficulty in this case, but after hearing all that has been said on both sides, I have come to be of opinion that it was a matter of obligation that the tenants should make the alterations specified, and if that is so, then there is a consideration other than the rent, which must be given effect to in fixing the value. I agree that the method adopted by the Assessor is not only a perfectly fair one, but is one for which there is ample authority.

The Assessor entered the sanatorium at the yearly value of £1300, proceeding either on the principle of taking a percentage on the cost of construction, or on the principle of taking the profits earned by the company, as the basis of valuation—the two methods in the particular case bringing out substantially the same result. The company appealed, and maintained that the value should be reached by comparison with other sanatoria and with hydropathics, and should be £500.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Kincardine held at Stonehaven, on 15th September 1904, for the purpose of disposing of appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, for the year 1904-5, the Nordrach-on-Dee Sanatorium, Limited, Banchory, Kincardineshire, appealed against an entry of "Sanatorium and grounds," of which the appellants were entered as proprietors and occupiers at the yearly rent or value of £1300.

The appellants maintained that the valuation should be reduced to £500.

The case for appeal after mentioned set forth that the following facts were admitted:—"In 1900 David Lawson, M.D., Edinburgh, a specialist in pulmonary diseases, who had interested himself in the new open-air treatment of tuberculosis, feued 25 acres of fir-wood from Sir Thomas Burnett of Crathes. A grassum of £5000 was paid, and the annual feu-duty is £8, 15s. With the assistance of his father and brothers Dr Lawson erected on this piece of ground the sanatorium, now the property of the appellants. The sanatorium was completed and ready for occupation in the month of March 1901. In 1902 Dr Lawson sold the sanatorium grounds and goodwill to the appellants for £53,000, payable in cash, but three-fourths of the shares are still held by Dr Lawson and his friends. The subjects taken over by the appellants consisted of buildings valued in the prospectus at £24,219, grounds 'all laid out,' valued at £9298, and furniture and utensils at £4590. Dr Lawson had spent about three years in preparing for the opening of the sanatorium and the superintendence of its erection. He had also bound himself to continue as medical superintendent of the sanatorium for five years, at a salary of £600 a year, after the flotation of the Company, and accordingly £15,000 was paid to him by the appellants in name of goodwill. The total subscribed capital was £55,000. The buildings were specially constructed as a sanatorium on the new Continental principles. The main hospital is one room broad, and is of wood on a two-feet stone foundation. The 25 acres originally feued have been, where the building is erected, cleared and laid out to the extent of about 1½ acres. Through the remainder of the wood belonging to the appellants several paths have been made. Wooden shelters for the use of the patients have been placed at various places in the woods. There are in the sanatorium dining-room, drawing-room, reading-room, dental, throat, and X-Ray rooms, laboratory, two doctors' rooms, staff room, matron's business room, and housekeeper's room, porter's room, and waiting-room, and fifty lettable bedrooms. Each patient has a separate bedroom. The charge is £5, 5s. per week for board, lodging, and medical attendance. Three duly qualified physicians and nine nurses are employed in the sanatorium, and the whole staff, inclusive of these, numbers fifty-two."

The case further stated,—"No evidence was led by either party, but in addition to the facts above set forth the following papers were placed before the Committee, and admitted by the parties as evidence in the appeal:—(1) The prospectus of the appellants; (2) and (3) the balance-sheets of the appellants for the years ending 28th February 1903 and 28th February 1904; (4) a statement prepared by the appellants shewing the situation, number of lettable rooms, and valuation of eight other sanatoria in the United Kingdom carried on with the same methods and objects as the appellants' sanatorium, and of Murtle Hydropathic, Aberdeenshire; (5) the British Medical Journal of 13th August 1904, containing advertisements and descriptions of each of the sanatoria mentioned in the statement."

The appellants contended that the annual value of the sanatorium and grounds should be ascertained by comparison with the valuations placed on other sanatoria and hydropathics throughout the country, the Assessor to keep in view in making the comparison (first) the number of lettable rooms in each, and also (second) the special circumstances of each sanatorium or hydropathic. On this basis the appellants maintained that the valuation should not exceed £500.

The Assessor maintained that a sanatorium could not fairly be compared with a hydropathic, and further, that the comparative method of valuation could not here be applied to any extent, there being no similar institutions in the neighbourhood of Banchory. The Assessor maintained that he was entitled to apply either what is known as the "contractors" principle of valuation, i.e., a percentage on the cost of construction, or the "profits" principle, and that either on being worked out shewed the valuation of £1300 to be reasonable.

The Valuation Committee "sustained the Assessor's contentions, confirmed his valuation, and dismissed the appeal."

The appellants took a case for appeal.

Argued for the appellants;—The valuation was to be fixed at the rent which a tenant might be expected to give if the buildings were put into the market unfurnished, and not at the rent at which their owner could afford to let them. The percentage or contractors principle therefore was inapplicable. The proprietors of buildings of an exceptional character, if they let their buildings, might be obliged to take a rent which would not give anything like an adequate return on the money spent in the erection of the buildings. The buildings here if put into the market would not realise anything like the cost of erecting them. A percentage on the cost of construction was to be taken as the basis of valuation "only where no other or better means of arriving at value exists."[1] Nor was the profits principle of valuation applicable here. The valuation was of lands and heritages only, and the profit earned here bore scarcely any relation to the heritable subjects. The profits of a company such as the present depended solely on the scientific skill, care, and attention shewn in the management of the sanatorium. The profits method of valuation was applicable only in a certain limited class of cases where there was a monopoly or quasi-monopoly attached to the business carried on in the subjects.[2] The appellants had no monopoly. Any other person or company could open a sanatorium close to their doors. The profit of the sanatorium depended on the personal factor, and could not be said to shed any real light on the question, what would a tenant give in the open market for the premises unfurnished? The true method of valuation—that which secured equality in the imposition of taxation—was by comparison with the value of other similar subjects, keeping in view the number of lettable bedrooms in each. That method had been adopted in the case of hydropathics,[3] and sanatoria and hydropathics were in the same category, for comparative purposes. Each had its lettable bedrooms as the only source of pecuniary profit to the tenant. The charges at sanatoria averaged about five guineas per week, at hydropathics three guineas. The difference had no connection with the value of the respective heritages, but arose from the medical attendance and nursing required at sanatoria and the greater care and scientific skill which had to be bestowed on residents in a sanatorium.

Argued for the Assessor;—Comparison with other similar subjects was an unsatisfactory method of valuation,[4] and in any case was inapplicable here. The statement prepared by the appellants regarding other sanatoria contained details regarding three sanatoria in Scotland, but the special circumstances of each of these made them useless for the purposes of comparison. The other sanatoria in the statement were in England or Wales, but the system of valuation there was different from that in Scotland, and in England and Wales there was an entire lack of uniformity in valuation; therefore no reliance could be placed on these valuations for purposes of comparison. Hydropathics were essentially different from sanatoria, inasmuch as the former were practically private hotels, and were very largely influenced by seasons, trade depression, and counter attractions elsewhere, which could not affect sanatoria. The proper method of valuation was either by taking a percentage on the cost of construction, or on the basis of the profits earned by the proprietor.[5] It was immaterial in the present case

Valuation Acts—Value—Consideration other than the rent—Agreement by tenant of farm to erect farmhouse.—The tenant under the lease of a farm, dated in 1897, for nineteen years, with a break at Whitsunday 1904 erected, in terms of the lease, at his own expense a farmhouse and offices, which the landlord bound himself to take over at a valuation on the termination of the lease. The lease was broken at Whitsunday 1904, and the parties entered into a new lease for nineteen years at a rent of £250. The landlord did not pay compensation for the buildings erected by the tenant, and by the new lease was taken bound to take them over at a valuation on the termination of the lease. The Assessor entered the farm and house in the Valuation-roll at the yearly value of £300. The tenant appealed, and contended that the yearly value should be £250—the rent in the lease. The Valuation Committee held that the rent in the lease fell to be disregarded, and proceeding on their local knowledge determined that £290 was the fair yearly value.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Peebles, held at Peebles, on 12th September 1904, for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, Alexander Davidson, farmer, Ladyurd, appealed against the entry in the Valuation-roll of "farm and house, Ladyurd," of which Sir Thomas David Gibson Carmichael, Baronet, of Skirling, was entered as proprietor, and the appellant as tenant and occupier, at the yearly rent or value of £300.

The appellant maintained that the value should be reduced to £250, being the rent stipulated in the lease, dated June 1904, then current, between Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael and the appellant.

The facts as appearing from the case on appeal after mentioned were as follows:—

Under an earlier lease, dated May 1897, the farm of Ladyurd and certain neighbouring lands were let by Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael and another (in respect of the neighbouring lands), first parties, to the appellant, second party, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1897 with a break at Whitsunday 1904.

This earlier lease contained, inter alia, the following provision:—

"And whereas it has been arranged between the said Sir Thomas David Gibson Carmichael and the second party that a dwelling-house and offices should be erected by the second party at his own expense on the farm of Ladyurd, on a site and according to plans and elevations to be approved of by the said Sir Thomas David Gibson Carmichael, the stones and sand for the said house and offices being obtained as far as possible from the quarries on the lands of the said Sir Thomas David Gibson Carmichael free of charge, . . . it is hereby declared that at the termination of this lease, whether at its natural or any other ish, the said Sir Thomas David Gibson Carmichael shall be bound, as he hereby binds and obliges himself and his successors, to take over the said house and offices from the second party or his foresaids, and the said sheds," at a valuation.

A dwelling-house and offices were thereafter, in 1897, erected by the appellant at a cost of between £1000 and £1100.

The earlier lease was broken as at Whitsunday 1904, and a new lease of the farm of Ladyurd, dated June 1904, was entered into between Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael, first party, and the appellant, second party, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1904, at the rent of £250 per annum.

Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael did not take over the farmhouse and offices erected by the tenant, and the new lease contained the following provision:—"And whereas, considering that the second party has at his own expense in the year 1897, in accordance with the terms of agreement thereanent contained in lease of" 1897, "erected a dwelling-house and offices, the first party hereby binds and obliges himself and his successors, at the end of this lease, whether at its natural or any other ish, to take over the said house and offices from the second party or his foresaids" at a valuation.

Under this lease the appellant was taken bound to pay the insurance premiums on the house erected by him, and he was also taken bound to reside on the farm and not to sublet.

On 16th August 1904, as for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, the Assessor issued to the appellant two Lands Valuation notices, viz.:—

(1) "Farm and House, Ladyurd—Proprietor, Sir T. D. Gibson Carmichael; tenant, Alexr. Davidson; occupier, same; rent or yearly value, £250."

(2) "House, Ladyurd Farm—Proprietor, Alexr. Davidson; occupier, proprietor; rent or yearly value, £30."

On the appellant intimating an appeal against the second of these notices, the Assessor withdrew them, and sent an amended notice giving the details as set forth in the entry in the Valuation-roll.

The appellant contended;—The first of the two original notices issued by the Assessor entering the farm and house at the value of £250, the rent under the lease, was correct, and the only proper entry. The second of the two original notices was in direct violation of proviso (1) of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, which exempted "erections or structural improvements made or acquired for agricultural purposes by the lessee of subjects wholly or mainly agricultural." The farmhouse erected by the appellant was necessary for the occupation of the farm, and as such had been occupied by him under the leases, and he was debarred by both leases from subletting it. The raising of the valuation of the farm by £50, after challenge of the legality of the separate entry of the house at £30, was an attempt to evade the exemption in favour of agricultural buildings given by the Act of 1895, and was in itself nimious and oppressive.

The Assessor contended;—The rent of £250 payable under the lease was not a rent of the subjects "conditioned as the fair annual value thereof without grassum or consideration other than the rent," within the meaning of the 6th section of the Lands Valuation Act of 1854. £300 was a fair valuation of the subjects.

The Valuation Committee were of opinion that the Assessor's contention as to the rent in the lease was right. They were further of opinion from their local knowledge that the rent at which the farm and the dwelling-house erected thereupon might, one year with another, in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, after taking into account the insurance premiums on the buildings, was £290. They accordingly sustained the appeal to the extent of £10, thus reducing the Assessor's valuation to £290.

The Assessor took a case for appeal.[1]

LORD LOW.—I am of opinion that the Committee are clearly right. There is no question that when the tenant erected the farmhouse it became part of the farm, and the property of the landlord. Under the lease of 1897, when that lease came to an end, the landlord's obligation was to repay the tenant the sums which he had expended in building the house. If he had implemented that obligation, then he would have been in a position to offer the incoming tenant the farm with a competent farmhouse, and, of course, the rent would have been fixed upon that footing. But apparently it was not convenient at that time for the landlord to repay the tenant the capital he had expended in building the house, and the arrangement was that payment should be postponed till the end of another lease. The Committee have fixed £290 as a fair rent, and I do not think we should interfere with that decision.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur, and would only add that the Assessor's first proposal to treat the farm and house separately, and to enter the house as the property of the tenant, was clearly a mistake,—a mistake which the Assessor corrected before he made the entry appealed against.

these reaches, and the fishings were entered in the Valuation-roll at a yearly rent or value which varied according to the number of salmon caught in the particular year. In 1904 the Duke entered into an agreement with certain upper riparian proprietors under which, in consideration of a yearly payment of £782, he agreed to abstain from netting these reaches of the river for a period of ten years, reserving his full right to fish therein by rod. For the year 1904-5 the Duke retained the rod-fishing of certain of the reaches in his own hands, and he let the remaining reaches for the purpose of rod-fishing. In the Valuation-roll for 1904-5 the "rod-fishings" were entered in so far as let at the rents stipulated in the leases, and in so far as in the Duke's own hands, at an estimated yearly value. There was also an entry in the roll of "right of net-fishing," of which the Duke was entered as proprietor and as occupier "for tenants" (no tenants' names being entered) at the yearly rent or value of £782—being the amount of the sum paid by the upper proprietors under the agreement. The Duke appealed against the latter entry and maintained that it ought to be deleted. It was not disputed that the value, as entered in the roll, of the rod-fishings, was the fair annual value of these rod fishings. That value was considerably in excess of the values entered in former years when netting was in use.

Held that the entry of "right of net-fishing" fell to be deleted, it being for the proprietor to determine in what manner his right of salmon-fishing was to be exercised, and it not being disputed that the value entered in the roll of the rod-fishings represented the fair annual value of that manner of exercising the right of fishing for salmon.

Case 236.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Elgin, held at Elgin on 13th September 1904, for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, His Grace the Duke of Richmond and Gordon appealed against four entries in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1905.

One of these entries was in the following terms:—

| No. | Description and Situation of Subject. | | Proprietor. | Tenant. | Occupier. | Yearly Rent or Value. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Parish of Bellie— | | | | | |
| 4 | Right of net-fishing | Spey | His Grace the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, K.G., per George Muirhead, Commissioner, Fochabers | ... | Proprietor for tenants | £328 |

The other three entries were, mutatis mutandis, identical with the foregoing, being under the heads of the parishes of Boharm, Rothes, and Speymouth respectively. The aggregate yearly rent or value entered in the four entries was £782.

His Grace maintained that the entries ought to be deleted from the roll.

The Valuation Committee having sustained the appeal and deleted the entries from the roll, the Assessor took a case.

No. 75.

Jan. 14, 1905.
Assessor for Elginshire v. Duke of Richmond and Gordon.

The case set forth that the following facts were found proved or held as admitted:—

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon was the proprietor of salmon-fishings on certain reaches of the River Spey, including, inter alia, the reaches to which the entries in question referred. Until 1894 His Grace was in the habit of netting the waters in the reaches in question, and former assessments and valuations were fixed as a result of the netting, and they varied from year to year according to the number of salmon caught. During the years in which the netting took place on the portions of the river to which the entries referred, the rod-fishings were unlet, and were entered in the roll at a total valuation of £88, whereof about £70 applied to the reaches of water in question. This £70 was the valuation in respect of rod-fishing in the months of September and October yearly, exercised by His Grace after he had ceased fishing for the season by net.

Prior to the commencement of the salmon fishing in the year 1904, His Grace entered into a minute of agreement between himself, as heir of entail in possession, and his son the Earl of March and Darnley, on the first part, and certain upper riparian proprietors on the Spey, on the second part.

The minute of agreement, which was to continue in force for ten years from 11th February 1904, proceeded on the narrative that the first parties had been requested by the second parties, with a view to improving their rod-fishings on the River Spey, to abstain from netting for salmon and other fish of the salmon kind within the portion of the river therein defined, and that the first parties were willing, in consideration of the yearly payment, and subject to the conditions therein expressed, to refrain for the period mentioned from netting that water.

The first article of the agreement set forth that "the first parties agree and bind themselves respectively, and their heirs and successors in the said Gordon-Richmond estates, to refrain so long as this agreement shall continue in force from netting for salmon and other fish of the salmon kind, in any manner of way, in that portion of the said Duke of Richmond and Gordon's fishings in the River Spey," [being the portion to which the entries in question related], "which extends from Cumberland Ford (which is about a mile below the bridge across the river at Fochabers) upwards to the Boat o' Brig: But without prejudice to the first parties respectively exercising by themselves or others having their authority, and letting to tenants at pleasure, the right of rod-fishing and angling for salmon and other fish of the salmon kind, or for other fish, in the portion of the said river before defined, and all other rights and privileges over the same belonging or competent to them: Declaring that all rights and privileges belonging or competent to the first parties, severally or jointly, are hereby expressly reserved to the first parties respectively, and shall not be affected in any way by this agreement, except only that netting for salmon and other fish of the salmon kind in the portion of the said river before defined shall cease during the subsistence of this agreement." By the third article, the second parties bound themselves to make payment to the Duke and his heirs and successors of the yearly sum of £883 during the continuance of the agreement. By the fourth article, it was provided,—"(Fourth) In respect of the foresaid payment of £883 per annum, the first parties and their foresaids shall pay and relieve the second parties of all taxes and assessments leviable in respect of the fishings in the portion of the said river defined in Article First hereof, whether in respect of ownership or occupancy, as well as all expenses in connection with the watching thereof." The first parties further bound themselves not to increase their netting in the reaches of the river below the portion in question.

The yearly payment provided for in the third article of the minute of agreement (less a deduction of £101 for occupiers' taxes and assessments in accordance with the fourth article) formed the basis of the Assessor's entries—amounting altogether to £782—appealed against.

The case further set forth:—"As a result of the said agreement the appellant has this year refrained from netting the portions of the river in question, but instead of netting, he is exercising his right of salmon-fishing in these portions of the river by rod-fishing. Some of these portions of the river he has retained in his own hands for rod-fishing, other portions he has let to" Lord Berkeley Paget and Mr Wharton Duff, under leases which were produced. "It was admitted by the parties that the rentals fixed in said leases have been fairly and properly entered in the Valuation-roll." The aggregate rents paid by Lord Berkeley Paget and Mr Wharton Duff and entered in the roll as the yearly rents or values of the "rod-fishings" held by these tenants, amounted to £1870. The portions of the reaches in question retained by the Duke for rod-fishing were entered at yearly rents or values amounting in cumulo to £314. "These entries for rod-fishings . . . are in respect of the same waters to which the entries for net-fishing appealed against relate. No net-fishing takes place in the waters in question. It was explained to the Court, and it is within the knowledge of the Court, that although fishing for salmon can be exercised by both methods—rod and net—it is impossible to exercise both to the full extent at the same time in the same reach of water, and that had the net-fishings in this reach of water been continued to be exercised by the appellant, it would have been impossible to let the rod-fishings for anything like the rents now procured and appearing in the Valuation-roll, and being the entries above mentioned for the rod-fishing." The aggregate valuation of the Duke's fishings on the Spey, including the portion nearer the mouth where netting still continued under the agreement as appearing in the Valuation-roll for 1903-4, was £2534, and for 1904-5 as inserted by the Assessor, it was £4209, an increase of £1675. "The said increase was obtained partly as a result of the appellant being able to let the rod-fishings to better advantage in consequence of his cessation from fishing the same portions of the river by net, and partly by the Assessor entering the said sum of £782 in respect of the net-fishings not exercised. . . . If this sum of £782 is deducted from the total increase of £1675, it still leaves an increase for the year as the result of the rod-fishing of £893 on the valuation for 1904-5, as against 1903-4."

The Committee "sustained the appeal, and deleted the entries relating to net-fishing appealed against, in respect that there has been no net-fishing carried on this year in the portion of the river to which the entries in question relate, and further, in respect that the annual value of the fishing subjects in the reach of the river in question is fairly and fully stated at the amounts entered in the roll this year as rod-fishing."

No. 75.

Jan. 14, 1905.
Assessor for Elginshire v. Duke of Richmond and Gordon.

Argued for the Assessor;—Section 3 of the Valuation Act, 1854,[1] required the Assessor to ascertain and assess the yearly rent or value of the lands and heritages in the county. Fishings were within the definition of lands and heritages.[2] The fishings on the reaches of water in question comprised both rod-fishings and net-fishings. The former were duly assessed at their yearly value; and unless a very important heritage was to escape, the net-fishings must also be assessed. The right of net-fishing the Duke covenanted not to exercise, and in consideration received from various riparian owners of the higher waters of the Spey an annual payment of £883, which must be taken to be the yearly value of these fishings to the proprietor. Instead of receiving a rent of £883 from a tenant fishing the river by nets, or by actual net-fishing taking out this value himself, the proprietor preserved these fishings from interference, and allowed the fish which would otherwise be intercepted by the nets to ascend the river. The ground on which he asked and received an annual payment for so doing was that he was entitled to a rent for this portion of his lands and heritages. Under the agreement between the parties the proprietor undertook to relieve the other parties of all liability to rates and taxes in respect of the stipulated annual payment of £883, and also of all expense of preserving the fishings in question and watching the river. This agreement was to all intents and purposes a lease, and the annual payment a rent. It was not necessary that actual fishing operations should be carried on to make the heritage the subject of valuation. Mines and quarries were specially exempted when not worked within the year;[2] yet it was decided in the Blantyre Parochial Board case[3] that the Assessor had wrongly omitted from the Valuation-roll the rent paid for minerals unworked. There was not a special exemption in favour of fishing rights not exercised within the year, and it had long been established[4] that salmon-fishings were to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their yearly value though no revenue was derived from them. If minerals rented, though not worked, were within the scope of the Valuation Act, notwithstanding the special exemption in favour of mines and quarries, much more were fishing rights, of which there was no special exemption, also within the scope of the Act, when producing a considerable yearly revenue indistinguishable from rent. The case was ruled by Ross v. Assessor for Lanarkshire.[5]

Argued for the Duke of Richmond and Gordon;—The decision of the Committee was right. The rent of the rod-fishings was the full rent at which, one year with another, the whole salmon-fishings belonging to the respondent might, in their natural state be reasonably expected to let from year to year. There were no net-fishings, and therefore no right of net-fishings could be entered in the roll. To assess the proprietor cumulatively on the basis of the rent at present received from rod-fishings and an imaginary rent from net-fishings would be unjust and contrary to law, inasmuch as the present high rent was obtained only by reason of the complete cessation of the net-fishing, and was a larger rent than could be got were both rod and net-fishings let. Net-fishing was not an estate or subject separate and distinguishable from the other modes and uses of salmon-fishing. Salmon-fishings were to be valued as one undivided subject, on the basis laid down by the Valuation of Lands Act, 1854, sec. 6. The annual payment of £883 was not "lands and heritages" in the sense of the Act, and was not assessable. It was the price paid for abstaining from netting. It was not rent, or an equivalent for or consideration other than rent. The Valuation of Lands Acts did not impose any duty on proprietors to utilise their property in any particular way, but left it to them to determine how they should use it. The fair annual rent of the subjects in their "actual state" was the proper basis of valuation. The case was ruled by the cases of Renfrew [1] and the Assessor for Fife v. Curror.[2]

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—Down to the current year of assessment the Duke of Richmond and Gordon was in the habit of netting for salmon certain reaches of the River Spey about 6 miles in length, and the valuations were fixed at fluctuating sums, according to the results of the netting. At that time the rod-fishings were unlet, but his Grace himself exercised the right of rod-fishing in the months of September and October in each year after the nets were off, and for this a sum of £70 was entered in the roll in addition to the value of the net-fishings.

This year the system has been entirely altered. The right of fishing is now exercised by the use of the rod alone, partly by the proprietor himself, but to a much larger extent by two tenants, Lord Berkeley Paget and Mr Wharton Duff, who pay rents amounting in all to £1870. These rents are admitted to be "fairly and properly entered in the Valuation-roll," which also contains an entry of £314, admittedly sufficient, for the portion of the river retained by the Duke. Together, these entries represent a large increase over the valuation of 1903-04, when the old system was still in force.

The Assessor, however, is not satisfied with these entries as representing the full value of the heritable right of salmon-fishing, which is the heritage in question. He says, and it is the fact, that the Duke derives another yearly payment in respect of the heritage. In January and February 1904 his Grace entered into an agreement with certain upper proprietors of salmon-fishing in the river, whereby he bound himself, for ten years from 11th February 1904, to abstain from netting for salmon within this portion of the river, and also bound himself not to increase his netting nearer the mouth, all his rights of rod-fishing by himself or his tenants being expressly reserved. For this abstention he is to receive an annual payment from these upper proprietors, which the Assessor proposes to enter in the roll (after making certain deductions) at £782, distributed over four parishes.

I do not wonder at the Assessor having raised this question, which is a novel and interesting one. But I am of opinion that the Committee acted rightly in rejecting his contention. The proposed entries are open to criticism as to their form, because the subject is described as "right of net-fishing," which assumes that net-fishing is a heritage separate and distinguishable from the other modes and uses of salmon-fishing, and because the occupier is described as "proprietor for tenants," which assumes that the upper proprietors are tenants of the right of net-fishing. Neither of these things can properly be predicated as the result of a contract which gives no right to the upper proprietors to net, but merely imposes on the Duke the obligation not to net.

But, apart from the form of the entries, it seems to me that the solution of the question is to be found in the 6th section of the Valuation Act of 1854, which provides that where lands or heritages "are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act." Now, it is not suggested that the leases to the angling tenants are not bona fide, or that the rents which they pay represent less than the fair annual value of the right of salmon-fishing with the rod. On the contrary, it is found as a fact that "had the net-fishings in this reach of water been continued to be exercised by the appellant, it would have been impossible to let the rod-fishings for anything like the rents now procured and appearing in the Valuation-roll." There is no suggestion that the same consideration does not apply to the value put upon the right of rod-fishing so far as it is retained by the Duke. The situation, therefore, is that he, having the undoubted right to determine by what legal methods his right of salmon-fishing is to be exercised, and having selected the method of rod-fishing, is receiving a full rent for that right so far as he lets it to others, and is putting on it a fair value so far as he retains it in his own hands. No doubt he has been fortunate enough to secure an additional payment from the upper proprietors, with the view of increasing the value of their own fishings in other parts of the river. But we must take it that this circumstance does not, in point of fact, diminish the rent which he receives from his actual tenants in this part of the river, and, if the rent or valuation (as the case may be) is fair and full, the requirements of the Act, I think, are satisfied, and nothing more can enter the roll.

I therefore propose that we should sustain the deliverance of the Committee.

LORD LOW.—I entirely concur.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the decision of the Valuation Committee was right.

in the Valuation-roll at an annual value brought out on the principle of taking the income of the company and deducting (1) the annual expenditure; (2) 5 per cent on a sum in name of tenant's capital for carrying on the business; and (3) a sum for tenant's profits, estimated at 20 per cent on the net income after deducting expenditure and the percentage on tenant's capital.

Held that the value of gas meters, owned by the company and hired out to customers, was to be regarded as tenant's capital, such meters being necessary for carrying on the business; but (2) that the value of cooking stoves, owned by the company and hired out to customers, was not to be regarded as tenant's capital, the hiring out of cooking stoves being a branch of business which a hypothetical tenant might or might not find it expedient to carry on.

Held further that a deduction from the net income did not fall to be made in respect of income-tax on tenant's profits.

Case 238.

At a meeting of the Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, held on 14th September 1904, for hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, the Kirkcaldy Gas Light Company, Limited, appealed against entries in the Valuation-roll for the year ending at Whitsunday 1905, of gas works, gas pipes, tanks, and ground, of which they were entered as proprietors and tenants or occupiers at the aggregate yearly rent or value of £4544.

They craved that the valuations should be reduced to the extent of bringing out an aggregate yearly rent or value of £3537.

The Magistrates having dismissed the appeal and adhered to the Assessor's valuation, the Company took a case.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted:—

"The appellants are a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, and they supply gas throughout the burgh of Kirkcaldy, and, to a small extent, in the adjoining burgh of Dysart. The appellants are the owners of a gas work situated on the Sands Road, Kirkcaldy, which is equipped with the ordinary plant of a gas work. They also are the owners of a piece of ground at Pathhead, Kirkcaldy, on which is situated a large gas tank. The Company also have pipes laid throughout the various streets of Kirkcaldy and through a small part of Dysart.

"For a considerable number of years the Assessor has been in the practice of making up the sum at which the Company are to be entered in the Valuation-roll on the basis of the Company's income in accordance with Lord Fraser's judgment in the case of the Falkirk Gas Company, 24th February 1883, 10 Rettie, 651.

"In connection with their business, the Company own, in addition to their gas works and pipes, a very large quantity of meters to measure the gas supplied to the consumers. For these meters the Company charge the consumers rent. The Company also own and hire out to consumers a large number of cooking stoves. The number of meters owned by the Company is about 9000, and they stand in the Company's books at the sum of £10,400. The cooking stoves stand in the Company's books at the sum of £1400. The Company derive from the rent of the meters the sum of £839, 7s. 4d., and from the rent of cooking stoves £124, 19s. 1d. On the other hand, the Company spent last year in repairing and renewing and refixing meters and stoves the sum of £967, 12s. 3d."

"For the current year the Assessor has entered the gas works and pipes at the sum of £4544, which sum is made up . . . in the following manner:—

"The appellants accepted the whole of the statement made up by the Assessor with the exceptions:—

"(a) That they maintained that the amount which the Assessor had allowed for tenants' capital was inadequate—this amount being £7000—and the appellants maintained that they were entitled as hypothetical tenants to an allowance of £21,000 as tenants' capital. This sum of £21,000 they maintained should be made up as follows:—

"1. A sum sufficient to enable them to carry on their operations during the largest quarter of the year, viz., the second quarter, when they would be lying out of a sum of approximately £9200—that sum being the amount of said second quarter's collection.

"2. The value of the meters belonging to them, which stand in their books at the sum of £10,400.

"3. The value of the cooking stoves—£1400, making in all the sum of £21,000, which they maintained they were entitled to have allowance for in accordance with the principles laid down by Lord Fraser in the Falkirk [1] case.

(b) That they maintained that in calculating the net revenue they were entitled to deduction of the income-tax and the owners' rates along with the other rates and taxes. The income-tax amounted to £259, and the owners' rates to £300.

"The Company accordingly maintained that the Assessor's calculations should be altered as follows:—

The Magistrates were of opinion—"(1) That the appellants were not entitled to any allowance for tenants' capital to cover cost of meters and stoves; and (2) that the appellants were not entitled to a larger allowance of tenants' capital to enable them to carry on the business than that proposed by the Assessor, viz., £7000; and (3) that income-tax and owners' rates should not be deducted along with the other rates and taxes in making up the amount to be entered in the Valuation-roll. The Magistrates accordingly dismissed the appeal and adhered to the Assessor's valuation."

Argued for the Company;—It was admitted that the principles of valuation laid down by Lord Fraser in the Falkirk case [1] applied here. In accordance with these principles 5 per cent on a sum in name of tenants' capital ought to be deducted from the net income. The value of the gas meters ought to be included in the tenants' capital. Gas meters were expressly mentioned by Lord Fraser, and both they and cooking stoves were a necessary part of the plant of such a business. An intending tenant, therefore, would require to find the capital for the purchase of such articles, and in determining the rent he could offer, would take account of the capital sunk in their purchase.[2] Income-tax on tenants' profits ought to be deducted from the net profits. The Company did not press the deduction in respects of owners' rates.

Argued for the Assessor;—The sum of £7000 allowed by the Assessor in name of tenants' capital was ample in the circumstances. In particular, an additional allowance ought not to be made in respect either of gas meters or of cooking stoves. Cooking stoves at all events were not a necessary part of the business of a Gas Company. No deduction ought to be made in respect of income-tax, which was a personal tax.

No. 76. At advising,—

Jan. 14, 1905. Kirkcaldy Gas Light Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Kirkcaldy.

LORD LOW.—The main question in this case is whether, in estimating the amount of floating capital which a tenant would require to enable him to carry on the gas works, the amount which it would be necessary for him to pay for meters and cooking stoves should be included?

I think that the cost of cooking stoves may at once be set aside, because it is not necessary for the carrying on of the business of making and supplying gas that the tenant should supply cooking stoves. That is a branch of business which he might or might not find it expedient to carry on.

The cost of meters is in a different position, because without meters the business could not be carried on at all. If, therefore, the gas works were let to a tenant, he would require, in order that he might be in a position to earn profit, to purchase the necessary supply of meters. It also appears that meters are not in themselves a source of profit, because the charges which are made to customers for the use of them are, as nearly as possible, balanced by the expenses of upkeep.

There is, therefore, a great deal to be said for the view that the cost of meters should be included in the tenant's capital. If, however, the question had been a new one, I should have had much difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the capital required to supply meters should be allowed, especially as it was stated by the Assessor that the practice has been not to include the cost of meters.

I do not think, however, that the question can be regarded as new. It is admitted that since 1883 the method of valuing gas works has been regarded as being settled by the opinion of Lord Fraser in the Falkirk case.[1] In that opinion, which was very well considered, Lord Fraser especially instanced the cost of meters as capital which a tenant would require to lay out in order that he might carry on the work, and upon which he was entitled to a percentage.

It seems to me that in the valuation of lands and heritages it is most desirable that when a rule has been once adopted by the Court it should not be departed from, unless very weighty reasons for doing so are adduced. I do not think that such reasons have been furnished in this case, and it seems to me that the view expressed by Lord Fraser in regard to the cost of meters was the logical result of the general principles laid down by him for valuing gas works which are being carried on for private profit.

Now, it is stated that the sum at which meters stand in the Company's books is £10,400, and it is not disputed that that sum fairly represents their present value. I therefore think that that sum must be included in the capital which the hypothetical tenant would require to find in order that he might commence business.

The sum which the Assessor has allowed for tenant's capital is £7000. If the cost of meters is to be included in the tenant's capital, that sum is too small; but, if upon the other hand, it is to be regarded as merely representing the amount of capital which the tenant would require to lay out upon coals and such like before he received any returns from the business, I think that it is much too large, assuming, as we are entitled to do, that the hypothetical tenant would be a man in reasonably good credit.

I think, therefore, that a fair sum to allow for tenant's capital would be £15,000. There being no dispute as to 5 per cent being the proper rate of interest to deduct, the result is to reduce the valuation from £4544 to £4224.

The appellants gave up in this Court their demand for a deduction on the head of owners' rates, but maintained their right to a deduction of a proportion of income-tax applicable to tenant's profits. I think the Magistrates were right in refusing to make the deduction. Any income-tax payable by the hypothetical tenant would be a personal tax chargeable on tenant's profits, and would not be deductible before estimating these.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

THE following was the opinion of the Judges:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates is wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £4224."

Valuation Acts—Value—Railway Hotel.—The North British Railway Company's Hotel in Edinburgh was entered in the Valuation-roll at the yearly rent or value of £11,950. The Assessor reached this sum by taking the floor space and applying thereto varying rates per square foot, and comparing the accommodation with that of other hotels in the city. The Railway Company maintained that the basis of valuation should be the profits of the hotel business, or alternatively the number of lettable bedrooms.

Held that no single method of valuation was reliable, and in the whole circumstances that the valuation should be reduced to £7000.

Observed that it was not legitimate to consider what rent might be obtained if the building were let for other than hotel purposes.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. LdStormonth-Darling. Lord Low.

Case 239.

AT a meeting of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, held on 12th September 1904, to dispose of appeals against valuations made by the Burgh Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, the North British Railway Company appealed against the entry of "Hotel and Grill-room, North British Station Hotel," of which the appellants were entered as proprietors and occupiers at the yearly rent or value of £11,950.

The appellants in their written appeal asked that the value should be reduced to £7000, but in the proceedings before the Magistrates they submitted that it should be £6000.

The following were the facts as appearing from the case for appeal aftermentioned:—

The building in question was rectangular, and enclosed a hollow square. It had frontages to Princes Street on the north, to North Bridge Street on the east, overlooking the Waverley Station on the south, and to the public passage, known as Waverley Steps, giving access to the Waverley Station from Princes Street, on the west. It consisted of thirteen floors, two of which were mezzanine. Five of the floors were situated below the level, one on the level, and seven above the level of Princes Street and North Bridge Street.

The site and building cost about £600,000. Parts of the building were let to tenants, as shops, offices, &c. The rental of the parts so let was £4354 per annum, and the proportion of the total cost applicable to them was about £100,000. The parts let were separately entered in the Valuation-roll, and no question was raised regarding these entries.

The subjects under appeal consisted of the remainder of the building, being the premises occupied by the appellants as a hotel and restaurant and grill-room. The hotel, restaurant, and grill-room were conducted by the appellants in conjunction with their railway system. The hotel premises contained, on the level of Princes Street, a very extensive suite of public rooms and grand entrance-hall and lounge, also parts of the hotel kitchens and the restaurant and grill-room; on the floors above Princes Street and North Bridge Street, bedrooms, sitting-rooms, bathrooms, and suites of apartments; and below the level of Princes Street and North Bridge Street, billiard and smoking-rooms, an entrance-hall for passengers from the railway station, kitchens, laundry, servants' bedrooms, stock-rooms, and extensive store-rooms. The number of separate rooms was over 420. The Assessor regarded 268 of these as lettable rooms, seventeen as public rooms, and the remainder as administrative rooms. The appellants stated the ordinary allocation as 213 bedrooms, twelve private sitting-rooms, and the remainder as public rooms and administrative rooms. The proportion of the total cost of the site and entire building applicable to the hotel and grill-room premises was about £500,000. The hotel was opened for business in October 1902.

The Assessor arrived at his valuation of £11,950 by taking the floor space, and applying thereto rates per square foot. These rates varied from 1d. or 2d. per square foot for a large part of the basement floors up to 5s. per square foot for a portion of the street floor.

The appellants contended that the Assessor had proceeded on a wrong principle in valuing the hotel on the basis of floorage area. In particular, the appellants adduced evidence to prove that large parts of the basement floors were useless for the purposes of the hotel and were a source of serious loss, in respect that much of the basement floorage, having no light from the outside, could only be lighted by artificial means, and could be used only for storage; that the total area of the four basement floors (about 76,000 square feet) was much in excess of the storage requirements of the hotel, and that large parts, although not used, involved a serious cost for light, cleaning, and upkeep generally.

The appellants stated that for the period from 1st January 1903 to 30th June 1904 the gross receipts for the hotel were £77,146, and the gross expenses (exclusive of manager's salary or any sum in name of rent) were £72,800, the receipts thus exceeding the expenses by the sum of £4346, equal to £2898 a year, and that the full season in the hotel lasted only for about ten weeks each year—in July, August, and September. The appellants did not contend for a valuation exclusively founded upon the figures of business done and profit and loss adduced by them. They suggested a sum of £6000 as being the maximum rent which any tenant could be expected to give for the hotel. Alternatively, the appellants contended that, if the valuation of the hotel was to be arrived at by comparison with other hotels in Edinburgh and elsewhere, the test of the number of lettable bedrooms was a sounder and safer basis of valuation than floor space. Upon that alternative basis the appellants contended that the valuation would not have amounted to £6000.

The Magistrates (as the case bore) "taking the whole circumstances into account, and giving due weight to the considerations affecting the peculiarities of the buildings, resolved to deduct £1950 from the Assessor's valuation, and to fix the rental in the Valuation-roll at £10,000." *

The appellants took a case for appeal.

At the hearing on the appeal it was stated that the parties were agreed that £750 should be taken as the value of the grill-room.

The undernoted authorities were cited.[1]

At advising,—

LORD LOW.—It is in my opinion plain, and indeed was not seriously disputed, that the cost of building the North British Station Hotel forms no guide as to the rent which might be obtained for it if it was let to a tenant. I am also of opinion that it is not legitimate to consider what rent might be obtained for the building if it were let for other purposes than that of a hotel. It was planned and built for the purpose of being used as a hotel; it is, in fact, used as a hotel; and the question is, what rent could be obtained for it as a hotel?

I am very much disposed to agree with Mr Clyde to this extent that, as a general rule, the safest guide in fixing the annual value of a hotel is to compare it with other hotels similar in character and situation, but I entirely

* The case bore that the Magistrates took into consideration the following circumstances:—"(a) That the portion of the building actually let, which produces a rental of £4354, cost £100,000; and that the hotel premises which the appellants retain in their own occupation cost £500,000. (b) That the hotel premises are occupied by the appellants as a hotel in conjunction with their railway system; and that on this account the occupation for hotel purposes may be worth more to them than it would be as a hotel to a tenant or occupier who was not interested in the railway undertaking. (c) That the premises, in their nature and in their actual state, admit, in the opinion of the Magistrates, of being readily let to tenants for many different purposes; and the rentals obtained not merely for the surrounding portions let, but for other premises in the city, let for such purposes as the present premises might be used for, may be taken into consideration. The situation of the premises is one of the best in the city for many business purposes. (d) That for the purpose of ascertaining the proper rental under the Valuation Acts of these hotel premises, comparison should be made with the rentals of the various premises in Edinburgh which most nearly resemble them in situation, character, and accommodation, making due allowance for the points of difference, and especially keeping in view the peculiarities of the present premises, as, for example, the disadvantages of the extensive building below the street level."

demur to his conclusion that the way in which that principle is to be applied is by taking floor space alone. I do not say that a comparison of floor space should be excluded, but I do not think that it can be taken as the sole test. Thus, it is plain that, as compared with other hotels, a large part of the floor space in the North British Hotel is not only not a profit-yielding subject, but is a positive disadvantage, entailing a considerable amount of expense without any corresponding benefit.

In like manner a comparison of different hotels by the number of bedrooms, or the number of lettable rooms, although it may be very useful in aiding the Court to arrive at a just yearly value, is apt to be rather misleading unless taken along with other circumstances, because it excludes from calculation all the benefits directly and indirectly derived from the occupation of public rooms by others than the inmates of the hotel.

In regard to the evidence given by the appellants as to the profits actually earned, I would only say that it seems to me that the most that can be deduced therefrom is that a large volume of business may be done in the hotel, but that upon the other hand it is an exceptionally expensive hotel to work.

I cannot therefore regard any single method of ascertaining the value as being reliable. I think that the proper course is to take a broad view of the whole information which is given in the case, other than that in regard to the cost of the building, and the rent which might be obtained if it were devoted to other purposes. So regarding the matter, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that the amount fixed by the Magistrates is greatly in excess of the rent at which, one year with another, the hotel might reasonably be expected to be let. In arriving at that conclusion, I have kept fully in view that it is a railway hotel, that is to say, that its situation and general arrangements enable it to command a large part of the custom of travellers arriving at the Waverley terminus.

I therefore propose that we should reduce the amount to £7000, including the grill-room, a sum which I am satisfied does not err upon the side of being too small.

value of £4264. This sum was reached by taking 19½ per cent on the capital value of the works and adding thereto feu-duty, insurance, and landlord's taxes. The 10½ per cent consisted of 4½ per cent as reasonable interest on the capital value and 6 per cent as being the average sum which the owners, if the works were let, would require to spend annually in order to fulfil the landlord's obligation to keep the works in an efficient state of renewal, such works being subject to rapid deterioration.

In 1904 the Company added largely to the number of the retorts in their works, and the Assessor in consequence raised the valuation to £6700. The Assessor reached this sum by taking the value as fixed for 1901-2 by the Judges, and adding thereto a sum to cover the value of the new retorts.

The Company appealed, and maintained that the value should be £3000, in respect (a) that the original works having depreciated in value they ought to be revalued; (b) that the Assessor had much over-estimated the value of the new retorts; and (c) that portions of the plant included in the valuation fell to be excluded under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1902.

The Valuation Committee adopted the principle on which the Assessor had proceeded, but reduced the valuation to £5800. The Committee found that the works had been kept in a not less efficient state than they were in 1901.

In an appeal by the Company the Judges held that the Valuation Committee were right, in respect that the original works having been kept in an efficient state of renewal, there was no necessity for a revaluation; that the sum fixed by the Committee as the value of the new retorts was reasonable; and that there was not sufficient evidence to shew what, if any, portions of the works fell to be excluded under the Act of 1902.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld Stormonth-Darling. Lord Low.

Case 237.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Linlithgow, held at Linlithgow on 10th September 1904, for the purpose of determining appeals against the valuation of properties by the county Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1905, the Pumpherston Oil Company, Limited, appealed against entries of "Crude oil works and railway, Deans," and "Crude oil works, workshop, and offices, Seafield," of which the appellants were entered as proprietors and occupiers at the yearly rent or value of respectively £4000 and £2700.

The appellants craved that the values should be reduced, respectively, to £1750 and £1250.

The case for appeal aftermentioned set forth as follows:—

"The following facts were admitted or proved:—

"The appellants are the lessees of the shale and other minerals belonging to one proprietor in the parish of Bathgate, and of the shale and other minerals belonging to two proprietors in the parish of Livingston. In the parish of Bathgate, and adjacent to their mines, they have erected, on ground feued by them, works for the distillation of shale into crude oil and crude naphtha, and for the manufacture of sulphate of ammonia, which works are known as the 'Deans Works.' In the parish of Livingston, and also adjacent to their mines there, they have erected, on ground feued by them, similar works known as the 'Seafield Works.' . . . The appellants are also proprietors of certain works at Pumpherston, about 4½ miles by rail from Seafield, and 3 miles from Deans, including a refinery, whither the crude oil and naphtha from both Deans and Seafield Works are conveyed for treatment. . . . The three works are carried on as one concern, and no separate accounts are kept shewing the income derived from any of the mines or works separately." The Seafield Works and the Deans Works "include retorts for the distillation of shale, together with condensing plant, boilers, economisers, tanks, ammonia house, naphtha plant, and other appliances. . . . No instance is known of a crude oil work being let as an independent concern.

"The annual expenses of renewals or depreciation on the works is 6·4 per cent over all. The present values were estimated by witnesses called by the Pumpherston Oil Company to be as follows:—Deans Works, £18,735, and Seafield Works, £11,388, conform to detailed valuation produced by them and printed along with the evidence in the Appendix hereto,* which values were stated to be exclusive of subjects not assessable under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1902. The Committee did not hold such values proved. . . .

"The Committee had before them the case in the appeal of the Pumpherston Oil Company for the opinion of the Judges, against the valuation of the Assessor for the county of Linlithgow of the same works for the year 1901-1902, together with the opinion of the Judges thereon.[1] In that appeal the valuation of the Deans Works was fixed at £2190, and of the Seafield Works at £2074. Since the date at which these valuations were fixed both works have been kept in a not less efficient state than at that time. For the year 1902-1903 the works were entered in the Valuation-roll at £2190 and £2074 respectively, and for 1903-1904 at £2300 and £2074 respectively.

"In the year 1901-1902 the number of retorts at each of Seafield and Deans Works was 104, but since then other 32 retorts were added at Seafield Works and 64 at Deans Works, the appellants having had the full use of these additional retorts during the current year. The 32 retorts added at Seafield Works were removed by the appellants from their works at Hermand, where they had been in use for some time. The 64 retorts added at Deans Works were new retorts. The retorts are an essential part of a crude oil work, such as those at Seafield and Deans, and the value of such a work is accordingly directly proportionate to the number of retorts.

"The appellants appealed against the valuations on the following grounds:—

"(1) That the method adopted by the Assessor in ascertaining the capital value of the subjects to which the percentage fixed by the Valuation Judges in 1901 should be applied, viz.:—taking an estimated cost of additions to the works based on figures supplied by other companies as the costs in their experience of such or similar additions, and adding these to the value of the subjects at the works in question in 1901, was not a sound one, in respect:—(a) That the costs in the experience of other companies were irrelevant and were not proved; (b) That the costs taken had no relation to the present actual value of the subjects in question; (c) That in adding the supposed cost of additions to the value of the subjects in question in 1901, the Assessor thereby (1) had not allowed for depreciation in the subjects since 1901, and (2) had not taken account of the effect on the subjects of section 1 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1902,[1] by which certain machinery or plant included in the valuation in 1901, e.g. gas mains, condensers, pumps, etc., are excluded from valuation; and (d) That there was no evidence to justify the Assessor in proceeding on cost instead of on the present actual value of the subjects.

* From the evidence it appeared that the valuation was made by Mr Munro, consulting engineer, Glasgow, who gave evidence in support of it, which was corroborated by other witnesses.

"(2) That the Assessor had erred in applying a rate in excess of 10½ per cent to the value as ascertained by him, in respect (a) That the Valuation Judges had fixed that rate in 1901; and (b) That a rate of more than 10½ per cent was in excess of what was reasonable.

"(3) That the present actual value of the subjects which are now assessable, as proved by the appellants, was as follows, viz.:—Seafield Works £11,388, Deans Works £18,735, and that the valuation of these subjects should be arrived at by taking a rate of 10½ per cent thereon and adding thereto the amount of feu-duty, insurance, and landlord's taxes.

"The Assessor replied—

"(1) That he had asked the Company to furnish him with a written statement of the cost of the additions to the works, and they had not complied; (a) That the costs in the experience of other companies as furnished by them to him was a good guide in the absence of the information which the Company should have furnished; (b) That the actual cost of the additions made had not even yet been shewn by the appellants; (c) That he could not allow (1) a reduction to be made each year in name of depreciation, by which (unless additions were made) the valuation would ultimately disappear, and (2) he did not admit and it had not been shewn that any machinery or plant was included in the valuation which fell to be excluded under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1902; (d) That, as explained previously, he had not been supplied either with 'cost or the actual value of the subjects,' and that he had therefore made his valuations after surveying all the oil works in West Lothian by comparing these works with the others. As to cost, he maintained that the original cost, and not the so-called present actual value, must be considered,—otherwise there would be a want of uniformity in the valuations.

"(2) That he had not applied a rate in excess of that fixed by the Valuation Judges to the value he placed on the works.

"(3) That he questioned the accuracy of and objected to the statements of 'the present actual value of the subjects' submitted to the Court."

The Valuation Committee found "that in view of the fact that the Court had fixed the valuation of the Deans Works and Seafield Works at £2190 and £2074 respectively for the year 1901-1902, that the works stood in the Valuation-roll at these figures respectively for the year 1902-1903, and at £2300 and £2074 for the year 1903-1904, and that the number of retorts at the Deans Works had been increased prior to the current year from 104 to 168, and at the Seafield Works from 104 to 136, that £3300 and £2500 represented the sums at which the subjects might reasonably be expected to let from year to year."

The appellants took a case.

The Assessor accepted the valuation of the Committee.

Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire.

LORD LOW.—In the judgment given by this Court in 1902 in the case of the Oakbank Oil Company, Limited,[1] certain things were settled in regard to the valuation of such works as those now in question. It was laid down (1) that the valuation was not to be on the basis of profits; (2) that the basis of valuation should be the present value of the works; (3) that no allowance should be made for ordinary repairs as distinguished from renewals; and (4) that 6 per cent on the present value was a fair sum to allow for renewals or depreciation, and 4½ per cent for interest on the capital represented by the present value. These two percentages (amounting together to 10½ per cent), plus feu-duty, insurance, and landlord's taxes, were held to be the annual value to be entered in the Valuation-roll.

That was a considered judgment, and must, in my opinion, be regarded as settling the principle according to which, as nearly as may be, the annual value in the present case must be ascertained. The question is, how in this case the present value of the works is to be ascertained?

The appellants contended that the result of the judgment of the Court in the Oakbank[1] case was that works of this description should be valued in each year. I do not so understand the judgment, and I think that it would be most unfortunate if it were necessary to have a fresh valuation in each year. The 6 per cent which was allowed was the sum which, it was calculated, would enable the proprietor to renew machinery or buildings which became worn out, or, in other words, to keep the works up to their original value. So long as the works are kept up by renewing what becomes worn out the value is maintained, and there is no necessity for a new valuation. If in any year there has been a failure to renew what has become worn out, that will be a circumstance to be taken into account; but here the Committee have found that since the date at which the previous valuations were fixed "both works have been kept in a not less efficient state than at that time." As regards the works, therefore, other than the new retorts which have been erected, I see no reason for altering the valuation.

In regard to the additional retorts, the appellants have not been able to state precisely what they actually cost, and therefore it was necessary to make an estimate. The Committee have done so upon the information before them, and I see no sufficient ground for interfering with the conclusion at which they have arrived.

A question was also raised whether the value of certain machinery should not be deducted, as falling within the provisions of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1902. Mr Munro, who gave evidence for the appellants, said that part of the machinery was of that description, and he has deducted it in his valuation of the works. He does not, however, state what precisely is the value of the machinery which he deducted, so that it is impossible to say what, in his opinion, was the value of the whole works if the machinery did not fall to be deducted. It is for that reason, I apprehend, that the Committee found that the values of the works for which the appellants contended had not been proved. Further, there is not, in my judgment, sufficient information supplied to enable the Court to form an opinion whether the machinery to which Mr Munro refers is or is not of the description to which the Act applies. I confess that my impression is that it is not.

Upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that we ought not to interfere with the valuation at which the Committee have arrived.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I took part in the judgment of 1902 to which your Lordship has referred, and I entirely concur in your exposition, both of what the judgment laid down, and of what it did not lay down. While it decided that the works were to be valued in their actual condition, it was much more concerned with the percentage to be taken on the capital sum representing present value, than with the question how that capital sum was to be ascertained. My recollection is that there was very little controversy on that question between the Assessor and any of the oil companies which then appealed (including the present appellants), and certainly the report of the decision in the Oakbank[1] case (which was held to rule them all) bears no trace of it beyond the general finding that the works were to be valued in their actual condition.

I also agree that, so long as the works are kept up in a state of efficiency as great as that which existed when their capital value was last ascertained, there is no necessity for a fresh valuation, except to discover how far their capacity has been increased. That is the principle on which the Committee have proceeded, for the addition which they have made to the existing valuation is entirely accounted for by the appellants' increase in the number of retorts. It seems to me that in so acting the Committee were right.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

The title to certain lands provided that a duplicand of feu-duty should be payable to the superior, "the first year of the entry of every heir and singular successor," and contained clauses binding each heir and singular successor to enter and record his title within six months of his succession or purchase, with an irritancy, in the option of the superior, of all conveyances inconsistent with these provisions. In 1874 these lands were disponed to Gordon's trustees, who in 1885 paid a duplicand. In 1903 Macdonald's trustees, who were singular successors, with a title ex facie absolute, but in reality in security, disponed the lands to Tough's trustees, with an obligation to relieve them "of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens, due from or on account of the said subjects prior to the term of entry." No duplicand had been demanded since 1885, but in 1903 the superior demanded and received a duplicand from Tough's trustees.

In an action of relief by Tough's trustees against Macdonald's trustees founded on the above-quoted clause of relief, held that the pursuers were entitled to decree, in respect (1) that the title to the feu made a duplicand payable on the occasion of each sale or transfer as well as on the death of each vassal, within the meaning of section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874; (2) that consequently the duplicand paid in 1903 had become payable in 1900, i.e., fifteen years after the last payment in 1885, and fell within the terms of the obligation of relief; and (3) that as the action was laid on an express obligation of relief, it was immaterial that the duplicand, although due in 1900, had not actually been demanded.

(SEE Tough v. Macdonald, supra, p. 324.)

By disposition, dated 5th August 1903, and duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, William Kid Macdonald and others, as trustees for the firm of J. & W. Macdonald, solicitors, Arbroath, disponed to Charles Tough and others, as trustees for the firm of Tough Brothers, rag-merchants, Dundee, a piece of ground in Dundee, with entry at 1st August 1903. The disposition contained, inter alia, the following clause:—"And we, as trustees foresaid, bind ourselves to free and relieve our said disponees and their foresaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens, due from or on account of the said subjects prior to the term of entry before mentioned, our said disponees being liable for and bound to free and relieve us of the same in all time coming."

In August 1903 the Earl of Home, superior of the said piece of ground, claimed a casualty of composition or duplicand of the feu-duty from Tough Brothers, and they, having paid it, brought the present action for relief against W. K. Macdonald and others, founding on the clause of relief quoted above, and on the fifth section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874.*

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), enacts, section 5,—"Unless where it has been or shall be otherwise stipulated, corporations shall pay at the date at which the first composition would have been payable if this Act had not been passed, and every twenty-fifth year thereafter, a sum equal to what but for the passing of this Act would have been payable on entry by a singular successor; and where a composition payable on the death of the vassal shall become exigible from any trustee or body of trustees, another composition shall be payable at the end of every twenty-five years, so long as the lands shall be vested in such trustee or trustees; and where by the terms of the feu-rights of the lands a taxed composition is payable on the occasion of each sale or transfer of the property as well as on the occasion of the death of each vassal, and a composition shall in consequence of the acquisition of the property become exigible from any corporation or from any trustee or body of trustees, another composition, unless where it has been or shall be otherwise stipulated, shall be payable at the end of every fifteen years from the date of such acquisition by such corporation or trustee or trustees, so long as the land shall be vested in such corporation or trustee or trustees, with such

The state of the title, as disclosed by the condescendence and answers, was as follows:—The original feu-charter of the said piece of ground was granted by the trustees under the Douglas Feuing Act, with consents therein mentioned in favour of John Gordon, merchant in Dundee, as trustee for the firm of John Gordon & Company, flax and jute spinners in Dundee, dated the 17th and 19th October, and recorded in the Register of Sasines the 4th December, 1874. The clauses in the feu-charter with reference to the payment of composition and entry of vassals, and the irritant and resolutive clauses therein, were as follows: "Giving therefor yearly the said John Gordon as trustee foresaid and his above written to the said Lucy Elizabeth Douglas of Douglas, Countess of Home, and the heirs succeeding to her, immediate lawful superiors of the same, the sum of £266, 7s. sterling, in name of feu-duty for the piece of ground above disponed . . . beginning the half-yearly payment of £133, 3s. 6d. at the term of Whitsunday 1890," &c. "and doubling the said feu-duty of £266, 7s. for the said subjects the first year of the entry of every heir and singular successor after that term, and these for all other burden, exaction, demand, or secular service whatsoever which can be anyways exacted or required for the said lot or piece of ground above disponed or any part thereof . . . and the heirs and singular successors of our said disponee in the foresaid piece of ground shall be bound to enter with the said Countess of Home or her foresaids, and to record the charter or writs so to be granted within six months after the date of their purchasing or succeeding to the said feu or any part thereof, . . . and it is hereby declared that all sales, dispositions, or other conveyances and transmissions, legal or voluntary, of the whole or any parts and portions of the said lot or piece of ground upon terms either in violation of or inconsistent with the conditions, declarations, and provisions herein contained, shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, in the option of the said Countess of Home or her foresaids, absolutely null and void to the receivers, with all that shall follow or may follow thereon."

The transmissions of the said piece of ground since the granting of the said feu-charter were the following:—(1) Disposition by Henry Hoile Gordon, merchant in Dundee, as heir-at-law of the said John Gordon, and as heir of provision in special of the said John Gordon in the said piece of ground, in favour of John Lindsay Gordon, residing at Ashludie, near Monifieth, merchant in Dundee, and the said Henry Hoile Gordon, as trustees for behoof of the firm of J. & H.

interest, if any, as may be stipulated for in the feu-rights during the not payment of casualties; provided always that in the event of such corporation, or of such trustee or trustees, ceasing to be proprietors of the lands after having paid a composition or compositions in terms of this section, the successor of such corporation, or of such trustee or trustees, who shall be duly infeft in the lands at the expiration of twenty-five years where a composition is payable on the death of the vassal, or at the expiration of fifteen years where a composition is payable on the occasion of each sale or transfer as well as on the occasion of each death, from the date of the last payment of composition as aforesaid, shall then pay a composition, and the casualties for and in respect of said lands shall thereafter become due and payable at the same time and in the same manner as if such lands had never been vested in such corporation or in such trustee or trustees . . ."

Gordon, merchants, spinners, and manufacturers in Dundee, and individual partners thereof, dated the 25th, 26th, and 28th November, and recorded 26th December 1879. (2) Disposition by Henry Hoile Gordon, as sole remaining trustee for behoof of the firm of J. & H. Gordon, and as sole and only partner of the firm of J. & H. Gordon, in favour of the defenders, William Kid Macdonald and Frederick Fothringham Macdonald, as trustees for behoof of their firm of J. & W. Macdonald, dated 13th, and recorded 17th November 1897. (3) The disposition by the defenders, Macdonald's trustees, with consents foresaid, in favour of the pursuers, as trustees for Tough Brothers.

The defenders averred, and it was not disputed, that the disposition in their favour, though ex facie absolute, was in reality in security of a loan. They also averred that the Earl of Home, as superior, had claimed a duplicand or casualty from them in 1900, and had departed from his claim on being informed that their title was only in security.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) On a sound construction of the feu-charter, receipt for casualty, and disposition by the defenders with consents, in favour of the pursuers, condescended on, and in respect of the facts set forth, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator and payment as concluded for, with interest and expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The casualty libelled not having been due by the defenders, they are not bound to relieve the pursuers thereof.

On 8th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor, whereby he decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers in this case are persons who purchased in 1903 from the defenders certain subjects in Dundee which are held in feu from the Countess of Home. The disposition contains a clause by which the defenders undertook to relieve the pursuers of all casualties and public burdens due at or prior to the term of entry. The present action is brought to obtain implement of that obligation with respect particularly to a taxed composition claimed by the superior as having become due in 1900, and which composition the pursuers paid as proprietors of the feu. The defence, as I understand it, is that the composition in question was not due as alleged in 1900, but was, if due at all, due only in 1903, and due in respect of the pursuers' own purchase and implied entry.

"The question turns upon the construction of the 5th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. That section, as we know, regulates the payment of casualties by corporations and trustees under the new system of implied entries; and it is here applicable in respect that the defenders' predecessors in title were a body of trustees who in 1879 acquired the subjects and became impliedly entered with the superior, and in 1885 paid a composition in respect of that entry. The pursuers' case is that under the rules laid down by the said section the casualty which they paid in 1903 was due and exigible prior to their (the pursuers') entry, having become so on the expiry of fifteen years from 1885.

"I have come to the conclusion that, having regard to the terms of the feu-right and to the just construction of the 5th section of the Act of 1874, the pursuers are right, and that there is no good answer to their demand.

"In the first place, as to the facts, I assume—what is not disputed—that the trustees, who were the defenders' authors, and who, as I have said, acquired in 1879, remained vested in the feu at all events until 1897. They Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The duplicand paid was not one due in 1900, but one which the pursuers paid for their own entry. Even assuming a duplicand was due in 1900, it was not paid, and the pursuers could not recover, under a clause of relief, unless they could shew that they had paid a debt falling under that clause. A casualty was not due till it was demanded,[1] and therefore no casualty falling under the clause of relief had been paid. (2) No casualty could have been enforced either in 1900 or 1903. Section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, in providing for the case where lands come to be in the possession of trustees, contemplated two cases. One was the general rule, by which trustees were to be liable to a casualty every twenty-five years, the other was the exceptional case, where a taxed composition was payable on "each sale or transfer of the probably remained vested until 1903; for, although they disponed in 1897 to the defenders, who were, I suppose, their agents, it seems to be conceded that this was merely a disposition in security. The exact date, however, is immaterial. What is certain is that the trustees remained vested at all events until more than fifteen years after their acquisition of the subjects in 1879, and after they had paid a casualty, as they did, in 1885.

The defenders reclaimed.

"In the next place, as to the terms of the title. I see no room to doubt that under the original feu-right (which was, it appears, dated in 1874, but for present purposes prior to the passing of the Act) there was, in the sense of the 5th section of the Act, 'a taxed composition payable on each sale or transfer of the property, as well as on the occasion of the death of each vassal.' The feu-charter declares expressly that the feu-duty shall be doubled the first year of the entry of each heir or singular successor, and it further provides that each heir or singular successor shall be bound to enter and record his charter or writ within six months after the date of his succession or purchase. It also declares that all sales, dispositions, or other conveyances or transmissions, in violation of or inconsistent with the foresaid provisions, shall be, in the option of the superior, null and void; and further, that the whole conditions, provisions, &c., expressed in the feu-charter, shall be verbatim engrossed or duly referred to, in terms of law, in all the after conveyances, transmissions, &c., of the feu.

"I confess I do not see what difficulty there can be either as to the construction of these provisions or even as to their enforcement. On the latter point some difficulties, which I am not sure that I quite appreciate, appear to have been suggested in the cases of Dick Lauder v. Thornton, 17 R. 320, and Hamilton v. Chassels, 4 F. 494. But, apart from the consideration that those difficulties could hardly, as far as I see, arise here, I apprehend that the question of enforcement is not here hujus loci. The point, I apprehend, here simply is, whether on the just construction of this feu-right a taxed composition was payable upon each transmission of the feu.

"Then, such being the terms of the title, what does the 5th section of the 1874 Act enact with respect to the pecuniary consequences of the statutory implied entry in the case of corporations and trustees? What in particular does it enact in the case (which is the case here) where, the feu-right providing for a casualty on every transmission, and not merely on the death of a vassal, the feu is acquired by trustees, and those trustees duly pay the composition due for their entry, and remain for fifteen years thereafter vested in the subjects?

"As I read the 5th section, it is quite express to the effect that another

And this was three years before the pursuers' term of entry. The defenders being at the time in possession and entered, the sole question is whether the clause of relief quoted does not bind them, notwithstanding the defence they set up that they were only security-holders. I cannot hold otherwise than that it does. They undertook as if they were absolute proprietors to give the relief, and in a question with the pursuers I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that they have no defence. I am unable to see that the defenders can obtain any ground of law for their defence from the case of Motherwell,[1] which was quoted at the debate. They cannot, as I think, found as against the pursuers upon the fact that the superior had not made any demand for the casualty of composition before they granted the disposition. If the casualty was due and exigible, as it certainly was, then it is such a casualty against which relief is guaranteed. It is difficult to see what benefit the clause of relief would confer, if it did not apply here. For if the superior had demanded the casualty the defenders would have had to pay it, in which case a clause of relief to their disponees would have been unnecessary. It was due, and therefore the pursuers could not resist the superior's demand. It was paid, and the demand of relief was in my opinion unanswerable.

An argument was addressed to us for the purpose of shewing that the limit of twenty-five years under the 5th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 applied to this case. I confess I am quite unable to understand how it could, and I do not find in the Lord Ordinary's note anything to suggest that such an argument was raised before him.

As regards the suggestion that what the pursuers paid was not the casualty due and exigible before the time of their obtaining their disposition, but a casualty due by them in respect of their own purchase, I adopt in its entirety what is said by the Lord Ordinary, and which it is unnecessary to repeat.

I would move the Court to affirm the judgment reclaimed against.

Lord Moncreiff—(Read by the Lord Justice-Clerk).—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed, and that on the simple ground which he adopts. The defenders when they conveyed the subjects to the pursuers in 1903 were infeft, and entered with the superior under a disposition ex facie absolute. The disposition which they granted in favour of the pursuers contained the following clause of relief: "And we, as trustees foresaid" (that is, as trustees for the firm of J. & W. Macdonald), "bind ourselves to free and relieve our said disponees and their foresaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens due from or on account of the said subjects prior to the respective terms of entry before mentioned."

Now, in point of fact before the term of entry of the pursuers, and while the defenders were in possession of the subjects, and entered with the superior, a casualty, that is a composition, became due and payable "from or on account of the said subjects" on 13th October 1900, in terms of sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

Tough v. Macdonald.

The defenders plead that they were only security-holders, and that therefore the superior had no good claim against them, But assuming that this defence would be relevant in other circumstances, this is not a question between superior and vassal; it is a question between disponer and disponee under a clause of relief. And whether the defenders were merely security-holders or not they were ex facie absolute proprietors, and took upon themselves the obligations of absolute proprietors in granting the obligation to relieve their disponees of all casualties which were due and exigible at the date of the disposition. Again, founding on the case of Motherwell[1] and others, they plead that as the superior did not demand the composition from them before they disponed the subjects to the pursuers, no casualty was due at that date from them or their authors; and but for the clause of relief there might have been room for argument on this contention. But as I have pointed out, the clause of relief is unqualified; there was a casualty "due from or on account of the subjects," and the necessary consequence of the defenders not having paid that casualty which they were bound to pay was that the pursuers had no answer to the superior's demand, and were obliged to pay it themselves and fall back on the clause of relief.

I confess I am unable to understand the grounds on which the defenders maintain that the twenty-five years' limit mentioned in the 5th section of the 1874 Act (which is confined to the case of a casualty becoming due on the death of a vassal), applies. The original feu-charter in favour of John Gordon provided that the feu-duty should be doubled the first year of the entry of every heir or singular successor. John Gordon apparently died before 1879, because in that year his heir, Henry Hoyle Gordon, granted a disposition in favour of John Lindsay Gordon and himself as trustees for their firm of J. & H. Gordon, and on that disposition they were duly infeft and impliedly entered with the superior as they were bound to enter under the feu-charter in favour of John Gordon. Being so entered they became subject to the provisions of the 5th section of the Act of 1874, and as trustees and singular successors they were liable in a composition, which they paid on 13th October 1885. By payment of that composition they (to use the Lord Ordinary's felicitous expression), enfranchised the trust for fifteen years, which expired on 13th October 1900. Whether they retained the subjects or alienated them, a second composition became then due and payable. Before the expiry of that period Henry Hoyle Gordon as sole remaining trustee for behoof of the firm, conveyed the subjects in 1897 to the defenders, who were duly infeft and entered with the superior. In October 1900, while the defenders were still in possession and undivested another composition fell due in terms of the statute, fifteen years having expired from the date of the last payment of composition. Three years later the defenders conveyed the subjects to the pursuers with the clause of relief which I have mentioned.

On that narrative I do not see any escape from the conclusion that under the clause of relief the defenders were bound to relieve the pursuers of the second composition.

Tough v. Macdonald.

If the second composition had been paid on 13th October 1900 when it should have been paid, the pursuers would not have been called upon to pay a casualty until 1915. But owing to the defenders' refusal to pay the casualty the pursuers had to pay it to the superior, in a question with whom they had no answer.

I confess that I share the difficulty which the Lord Ordinary has felt in seeing how the cases of Dick Lauder v. Thornton,[1] and Hamilton v. Chassels,[2] can assist the defenders; and I still less appreciate the grounds of the defenders' contention that the twenty-five years' limit and not the fifteen years' limit applies to the case.

In what I have said I do not think I have gone back in any way on what was decided in the cases of Motherwell,[3] and The Heriot's Hospital Trustees v. Caledonian Insurance Company,[4] which were cases between superior and vassal, and which raised no question on a clause of relief. In the latter case, although it did not raise the same question, I had occasion very carefully to consider the terms and meaning of the 5th section of the statute.

On the other hand I think that the cases of Straiton,[5] and Farquharson v. Caledonian Railway Company,[6] assist the pursuers. I am accordingly prepared to dispose of the case as the Lord Ordinary has done, and on the same grounds.

As this is sufficient for the decision of the case, I have not found it necessary to examine more particularly the conditions of the original feu-charter in favour of John Gordon, upon the terms of which I think a separate and independent argument could be successfully rested by the pursuers.

the minuter is entitled to an assignation by the trustee in his favour of all the rights and claims paid for by him, particularly of all claims outwith the scope of the foresaid action, but included in the terms of settlement."

On 23d November 1904, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the crave of Edgar's minute, and interponed authority to the joint minute for the pursuer and the trustee.

Edgar reclaimed, and argued;—(1) A dissentient creditor had a right at common law to take up an action which the trustee in a sequestration proposed to compromise, provided he put the trustee in as good a position as he would have had under the compromise, and indemnified the trustee and the trust-estate against any loss which might result from the continuance of the litigation.[1] This right did not depend on any appeal being taken under the Bankruptcy Act. A creditor might never hear of a resolution to compromise until the time for appeal had expired. Further, appeal was not here an appropriate remedy, because the reclaimer's object was not to challenge the resolution to compromise, but to take up the asset. (2) In the circumstances the indemnity offered by the reclaimer was sufficient.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no doubt about the trustee's right to compromise under section 176 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.[2] The compromise was completed either when its terms were adjusted,[3] or when the joint minute was signed. In either case the settlement of the action had been effected before Edgar's minute was lodged, and when the pursuer and the trustee were the only parties to the case. The pursuer could not therefore now be compelled to give up the settlement. Edgar should have appealed under the provisions of section 169 of the Bankruptcy Act, and his proposed intervention was now too late.

Argued for the trustee;—Before the creditor could take up the action the trustee was entitled to an absolute indemnity for himself and the trust-estate. It was quite clear that the guarantee offered was not sufficient.

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—(After narrating the facts)—The Lord Ordinary has refused the crave of Mr Edgar's minute, and has interponed authority to the joint minute compromising the action. The question, accordingly, is whether the Lord Ordinary should have allowed Edgar to intervene as defender in the action. In my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right. That interlocutor has been maintained to us on two grounds, the first by the pursuer and the second by the trustee.

It is said in the first place that a compromise has been effected by the trustee which is final and conclusive, and reference has been made to section 176 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, which provides that the trustee may, with the consent of the commissioners, compound any question regarding the estate, and that the compromise shall be binding on the creditors. It appears to me that there is a great deal of force in this argument. I do not know what the language of section 176 means unless it gives the power to compromise. Prima facie the statute has considered that the interests of the creditors are sufficiently guarded by the trustees and commissioners, and if they are satisfied as to the compromise, they are entitled to carry it through. Whether a creditor who considers himself aggrieved has any recourse against the trustee I do not inquire.

I can fancy that in a case where the trustee has rushed through a compromise in order to defeat the rights of creditors something might be said, but nothing of that sort occurred here. The creditor here knew that the trustee and commissioners proposed to compromise the action, and took no advantage of the provisions of the statute, and I agree with Mr Constable that so far as his client, the pursuer in the action, is concerned, the compromise has been concluded.

But then it is said in the second place, that the creditor has still a right to intervene. I have no doubt that in certain circumstances a trustee is bound to allow a creditor, who thinks he has compromised for an inadequate sum, to use his name, provided he is willing to keep the trustee and the estate indemnis. But the trustee is not bound to allow the use of his name unless he is indemnified by the creditor, and the question is whether the indemnity proposed by Mr Edgar is sufficient.

The action is one of damages, and none can tell what a jury may award. Then, again, the amount of expenses is quite unsettled, and there are various other indefinite claims. The offer made by Mr Edgar is to pay a specific sum, with the legal expenses already incurred, and to grant a bond of indemnity for £500 to the satisfaction of the Clerk of Court. Is it clear beyond doubt that this limited guarantee for £500 is perfectly certain to indemnify the trustee and the estate? I think it is not, and on both grounds I think the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD M'LAREN.—In the scheme of the Bankruptcy Act the three stages in the formation of a contract, which are commented on by Lord Stair and are familiar to lawyers, are kept distinct—the stages of consideration, resolution, and engagement. Full consideration is provided for by the necessity for consultation of the commissioners before the trustee resolves upon any administrative act of importance. If the trustee and the commissioners are then agreed, their resolution must be formulated by a deliverance, and a creditor who feels aggrieved by the resolution has the right of appealing against it to the Sheriff or the Lord Ordinary. It is only when the preliminary procedure has been carried through that the question has passed into the stage of resolution, and the trustee is entitled to enter into a binding engagement. Now, after an engagement has been entered into under these conditions, I do not think that a creditor can come forward and be heard to say,—"This is an improvident arrangement, and I object to it." The answer to that would be,—"Your rights, along with those of the general body of creditors, are placed (subject to review) in the hands of the trustee and commissioners, and your time to object, if you desired to do so, was when the resolution to compromise was taken." Here the disputed act of administration is a compromise, and I agree with Lord Adam that the power to compromise, given to a trustee by the Bankruptcy Act, is as broad and clear in its terms as such a power could well be, and the provision that a compromise shall be "binding on the creditors" is a warning to them that, unless they appeal at the proper time, they will be bound by the act of the trustee. Mr Edgar had his opportunity of going to the Lord Ordinary and objecting to the compromise. If he had done so, his first contention would no doubt have been that the trustee ought to contest the action, at the expense of the bankrupt estate, for the benefit of the general body of creditors. He would probably have failed in that contention, for I do not think that any Judge, who had examined the subject-matter of this action, would have held that the trustee could conscientiously defend it at the expense of the estate, and I think he would have held, and rightly held, that the trustee was justified in compromising, rather than in running the risk of a decree of reduction going out with expenses against the estate.

It is not contended that the creditor has been prevented from using his right of appeal, but it is maintained that cases might arise where, under similar circumstances, the creditor might be put to serious prejudice if kept in ignorance of the resolution. I do not think that the Bankruptcy Act professes to safeguard the interests of creditors in every possible contingency; it only provides for them such protection as is consistent with a speedy and effective winding-up of bankrupt estates. Further, it cannot be maintained here that Mr Edgar was prejudiced while in ignorance of the steps that the trustee proposed to take, for he was one of the commissioners himself, and was necessarily aware of what was going on, and yet he neither appealed nor entered into negotiations for carrying on the litigation himself. He is, unfortunately, not in a position to give the necessary guarantee himself, but has had to go to an insurance company to obtain it, and that is a proceeding that takes time. The trustee gave him due warning that the time during which the guarantee must be offered was running out, and it was no doubt a misfortune for Mr Edgar that he was unable to obtain it before that period expired. But I do not think that there was any duty on the part of the trustee to delay a compromise which he considered to be beneficial to the estate, merely for the purpose of enabling a creditor to contest an action which he himself thought he could not conscientiously defend. I think he was quite right in effecting the compromise when he did, and I see no grounds on which a Court of law could interfere to set it aside.

I do not know on what precise ground the Lord Ordinary based his judgment, but we are told that it was on the ground that the trustee had the power to compromise, and had effectually done so by the joint minute. Both on that ground, and on the ground that the trustee was not bound to lend his name to a creditor without an adequate indemnity, I concur with your Lordship in the judgment proposed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur.

Counsel for the pursuers and respondents were not called upon.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action at the instance of a liquidator for payment of £1196. The defenders says that the pursuer is not entitled to insist in the action, because he agreed to a compromise of the claim, and has failed to apply to the Court for sanction of that compromise. The alleged agreement for compromise is to be found in an offer contained in a letter by the agents of the liquidator to the agents of the defender, dated 14th March 1904, and an acceptance of that offer contained in the defender's agents' letter of 22d March 1904—(His Lordship read these letters). These letters contain a clear offer and a clear acceptance of that offer. But the offer was made under the condition that it was subject to the approval of the Court. The statement referred to in the letter of the liquidator's agents was lodged with the liquidator, and after it had been in his hands for seven weeks, he received a letter, dated 19th May 1904, from Mr Peter Macnaughton, on behalf of creditors, objecting to the proposed compromise. This letter was forwarded to the defender's agents on 23d May. Then on 6th June the liquidator's agents write as follows—(His Lordship read the letter). Then finally on 8th June the liquidator's agents write that "in view of the attitude taken up by the creditors, and the strongly expressed opinion of counsel that the Court would not sanction the proposal, it seems futile at this stage to present the note to the Court on the subject." The liquidator consequently refused to proceed further with the compromise, and the question now is whether he is entitled to proceed with this action, or whether he can be compelled to present a note to the Lord Ordinary for approval of a settlement to which he is now opposed, and we are asked to dismiss this action and to compel the liquidator to take steps for the completion of the compromise. I have always understood that in all these questions which occur in the course of liquidations, when the consent of the Court is required, there is locus pœnitentiæ until the consent of the Court is obtained. Here no consent had been obtained, and I think in the circumstances the liquidator was justified in refusing to present a note for approval of the compromise, which he thought would be useless, and that the Lord Ordinary was quite right in repelling the defender's third plea and allowing a proof.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship. I think the letters that passed were probably sufficient to constitute a compromise if the liquidator had power to make one. But a liquidator has not the power to make a compromise without the sanction of the Court, and he must act on his own judgment as to applying for the sanction of the Court to a suggested compromise, especially when, as here, he was advised by counsel, on full consideration of the question and in view of objections by creditors, that it would not be advisable to make such an application.

The Court was not, in fact, asked to give its sanction to this proposed compromise which the liquidator now declines to conclude, and I consider that there must be locus pœnitentiæ up to the time when the parties whose consent is necessary, viz., the liquidator, the debtor and the Court, have agreed to give it.

In this case the Court has not given its consent, and consequently there is no concluded agreement.

I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I think the defender's third plea might have been repelled upon its own demerits apart from the correspondence. The plea is that the liquidator is barred from insisting in this action by reason of an exception personal to himself, or in other words by a personal bar which does not affect the Company or its creditors, on whose behalf the action is brought. I think that is not a tenable contention, and that this would have been a sufficient ground for repelling the plea.

But I entirely agree that there was here no concluded compromise binding on the liquidator in his capacity as liquidator, because until the agreement for compromise had been finally approved and sanctioned by the Lord Ordinary there was locus pœnitentiæ.

I think also on the letters, apart from the absence of sanction by the Court, there was no concluded agreement, because it was only made conditionally (1) on the approval of the Court being obtained, and (2) upon an accurate statement of his affairs being made by the defender. In virtue of the second condition it was open to the liquidator, and indeed it was his duty to consider whether the statement made by the defender was accurate, and to accept or reject it accordingly. No doubt it is an observation against him that he retained the statement for six weeks without stating any objection, and indeed that he indicated that he saw no objection to it, because he intimated that he was going to present the note. But there was no definite acceptance, and while the matter was still open he received notice of an objection which apparently had not been previously known to him, because the agent of a creditor informed him by letter that he opposed the compromise on the ground that the sum offered was out of the question, and that the defender had put a sum of £1000 beyond the reach of his creditors by transferring it to his wife and daughter, and that these transferences would not bear inquiry. It is clear enough that the liquidator was not called upon to accept the mere statement of an opposing creditor as conclusive of the fact. But on the other hand, the statement made it impossible for him to move for sanction without informing the Lord Ordinary that it had been made; and it is certain that on that information the sanction of the Court must have been withheld until the creditor's allegation was disproved or withdrawn.

The defender says that the liquidator had bound himself to "recommend" the compromise for sanction. No such obligation could have been lawfully undertaken, and there is nothing in the correspondence from which it can be inferred. The duty of the liquidator when he presents a compromise for sanction is to bring all the facts before the Lord Ordinary, and to keep back nothing that is material to the propriety and expediency of the transaction. The pursuer would have been acting in breach of his duty if he had done what the defender says he ought to have done, and moved the Lord Ordinary to sanction the compromise in ignorance of the creditor's allegation that funds had been put away. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Schedule 1, sec. 11—Medical examination of workman—Refusal—Obstruction—"Provided and paid by the employer."—A workman who was receiving weekly payments as compensation fixed by agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and who had twice submitted himself for examination by a medical practitioner provided by the employers, and been certified not to have recovered, immediately after the second examination went to Ireland to reside with his father. About two months thereafter he was again required to submit himself at Glasgow for examination by the employers' medical man. He offered to submit himself to a medical man near the place where he was residing in Ireland, but he refused to come to Glasgow for examination unless his expenses were paid.

1st Division.
Lord Kincairney.

On 17th October 1903 Henry Kane, locomotive man, Twechar, Dumbartonshire, met with an accident while in the course of his employment with William Baird & Company, Limited, coalmasters at Twechar. The employers agreed to pay Kane 10s. 8d. per week as the compensation payable to him under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and compensation at the agreed-on rate was paid down to 4th June 1904. On 21st March 1904 a memorandum of this agreement was registered. On the requisition of the employers Kane submitted himself on 16th December 1903, and again on 24th March 1904, for examination by a medical practitioner provided and paid by the employers, and on both occasions it was reported that he had not fully recovered. About the end of March 1904 Kane went to Ballymony, County Antrim, Ireland, to live with his father. On 16th June 1904, while Kane was still residing in Ireland, the employers called upon him to submit himself for examination by their medical practitioner in Glasgow. Kane refused to come to Glasgow or to Twechar for examination at his own expense, but offered either to come to Glasgow for examination on condition that the employers paid his outlays for coming and returning, or to proceed to the nearest large town to Ballymony at their expense, and be examined there by a medical practitioner provided by them. On 30th June 1904, the employers, who had paid no compensation since the 4th of that month, intimated that no further compensation would be paid until Kane submitted himself for examination at Glasgow or Twechar. The letters quoted infra * shew the positions taken by the parties. On 5th August 1904 Kane charged the employers on an extract of the registered memorandum of agreement to pay him £4, 5s. 4d. as compensation at 10s. 8d. per week from 5th June to 31st July 1904. The employers brought a suspension of the charge.

The complainers maintained that as the respondent had refused to submit himself for examination, or had obstructed such examination, his right to the weekly payments under the agreement had been suspended since 18th June 1904 in virtue of the provisions to that effect contained in section 11 of the First Schedule of the Workmen's Comin the Second Schedule to this Act, and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman at the time of the examination shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive evidence of that conditlon. If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place."

* Letter from Kane's law-agents, dated 7th July 1904.—"The request that you make, that Kane should now return to Twechar or Glasgow merely to be medically examined is most unreasonable. In our letter of 29th ultimo we gave you a copy of a medical report which Kane sent us, which shews that he has not recovered, and if you wish to see the original we shall be glad to exhibit it here. We have no objections to your having a medical report of Kane as often as ever you please, so long as it is at your expense and not his."

Letter in reply, dated 11th July 1904.—"I do not argue that I had any right to object to your client going to Ireland, but I most certainly hold that if a workman in receipt of compensation does leave this country he must, if he wishes to retain his right to same, be prepared to return at his own expense when called upon to comply with the provisions of the statute."

pensation Act, 1897. They offered without prejudice to pay compensation for the period from 4th to 18th June.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said charge is inept in respect (a) that it bears to proceed upon a recorded memorandum of agreement which has not been binding on the complainers since 18th June 1904; and (b) that the respondent's right to compensation has been suspended since 18th June 1904.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The respondent not having refused to submit himself to medical examination, and not having obstructed the same, the complainers were not entitled to suspend the weekly payments of compensation due to him.

On 4th January 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that on 17th October 1903 the respondent was injured in the course of his employment with the complainers; (2) that the parties agreed that 10s. 8d. was the amount of weekly compensation payable to the respondent by the complainers under the Workmen's Compensation Act; (3) that the respondent registered a memorandum of the said agreement; (4) that on the requisition of the complainers the respondent was examined by a medical practitioner provided by the complainers on 16th December 1903 and on 24th March 1904, when the medical practitioner reported that the respondent had not fully recovered; (5) that at or about the date last mentioned the respondent went to Ireland, where he has since resided with his father; (6) that on 13th June 1904 the complainers required him again to submit to examination at Glasgow by the medical man selected by the complainers; (7) that the complainers have not offered to pay to the respondent the expense of travelling to Glasgow in order to submit to said examination; (8) that the respondent has not submitted to the medical examination required by the complainers; (9) that he was not bound to do so without a tender of such expenses, and that he has not incurred the penalty imposed by the statute: Finds the charge orderly proceeded: Dismiss the suspension, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.—This case raises a question of some importance under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and involves a consideration of the 11th section of the First Schedule, which has been differently construed by the two Divisions of the Court in recent cases—in Davidson v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Steel Company, Limited, 24th June 1903, 5 F. 991, pronounced in the Second Division; and in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited, v. Mackay, 14th July 1903, 5 F. 1121, and Strannigan v. Baird & Company, 7th June 1904, 6 F. 784—both decided in the First Division. These cases refer chiefly to the meaning of the provision in the 11th section of the First Schedule in regard to the right conferred on a workman who has been injured to submit himself for examination to a medical practitioner appointed for the purposes of the Act, and the consequences to the workman if he does not do so. Generally speaking, the difference between the judgments of the two Divisions may be said to consist in this. The Second Division held that the provision was obligatory on the workman, and that his failure to comply with it involved the suspension of his right to weekly payments until that examination had taken place, holding that the words 'such examination' at the close of the section refer to, or include a reference to the examination by the medical practitioners appointed under the Act; whereas in the First Division it was held that the provision was not obligatory but optional only, and that no such

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—The respondent had obstructed the medical examination, and his right to compensation was consequently suspended. He must either submit himself to the medical practitioner selected by the employers, or, if he for any reason objected to an examination by the practitioner so selected, he must submit himself to one of the medical practitioners appointed under the Act.[1] If it was necessary the complainers here were prepared to maintain that the reasonableness of the demands of the parties respectively did not enter into the question, the statute having provided a remedy against unreasonableness on either part, viz., on the one hand a right to the workman to substitute an official medical practitioner for one selected by the employer, and on the other hand a right to the employer to suspend the payments if the workman did not submit himself either to the employer's medical practitioner or to an official one. But it was not necessary to put the complainers' consequence followed if the workman did not avail himself of the option. Their Lordships held that the words 'such examination' refer only to examinations required by the employers by the medical practitioner provided and paid by them. In the Second Division Lord Young dissented and expressed an opinion in accordance with that afterwards adopted by the First Division. In the case of the Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited, in the First Division, the judgment in the case of Davidson was doubted, but in the case of Strannigan it was expressly dissented from.

"In the case of Neagle v. Nixon's Navigation Company, Limited, 13th January 1904, 1 K. B. 339, a judgment was pronounced in the Court of Appeal, in which the opinion of Lord Young in the case of Davidson and the judgment of the First Division in the case of Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company were expressly adopted. In that state of the authorities I think it would be proper to follow the later judgments on these points so far as they fall to be considered in this case, even if I did not, as I do, assent to and concur in them.

"There are, however, peculiarities in this case which differentiate it from these cases. The special features of this case seem to be these: First, the workman Kane, the respondent, registered a memorandum of the agreement as to his remuneration, as provided by section 8 of the Second Schedule of the Act, and charged upon the extract of it, and the case was brought into the Court by a suspension of the charge by the employers instead of by a stated case. Secondly, the injured workman was thrice requested to submit to examination, and he complied with the first two requisitions—he being then resident in Scotland—and submitted twice to examination by the medical practitioner named by the employers; but he has not complied with the third requisition, on the ground that he is now resident in Ireland and cannot afford the expense of coming to Scotland to be examined by the employers' medical practitioner. Here, as in the cases cited, the workman has not, as he was entitled to do, exercised the option of submitting himself for examination to an official medical practitioner—although I take it for granted he could have found an official practitioner conveniently accessible in Ireland. I understand that the respondent offers to come to Glasgow at the complainers' expense, or else to submit to examination by a practitioner accessible to him in Ireland selected by the complainers.

"The complainers have contended that the workman, by failing to submit himself to examination by a statutory practitioner, incurred the penalty case so high. Their conduct here had been quite reasonable; and it was unreasonable for the workman on the eve of convalescence to go to Ireland, far away from the scene of the accident, unless he was willing to come back for examination when required. If the workman was physically able to do so, he was bound to go to the medical practitioner, and the employer was not bound to send the medical practitioner to him. The rules as to medical referees[1] shewed that this was the true interpretation of the statutory provisions on the subject.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD ADAM.—This is a suspension brought by William Baird & Company, Limited, who were the employers of the respondent. The facts which raise the question are not in dispute. They are set forth in the Lord of the suspension of his right to weekly payments, as provided at the close of section 11 of the First Schedule. For this contention their authority is the case of Davidson, and their argument would be conclusive if that judgment were followed. But I am of opinion that that judgment has been overruled by the cases of Niddrie and Strannigan, supported by the English case of Neagle; and that, following these decisions, I must hold the respondent did not incur the statutory penalty merely because he has not exercised the option of applying to the medical referee.

"But it is argued that in these cases there was no refusal by the workman to submit himself for examination by the medical man selected by the employer. In these cases the workman had in fact submitted to the examination required. In this case also the workman has submitted twice to the examination of the medical practitioner provided and employed by the employers. But then the employers have required him to submit to such examination a third time, as, if their demand was reasonable, they were entitled to do, the Act providing that the workman shall submit to examination 'from time to time' if so required by his employers; and he seems to be under the same obligation to comply with the last of such requisitions as with the first, and the statutory consequences of refusal must be the same in the one case as in the other, and that consequence is undoubtedly suspension of payments until the examination takes place.

"If Kane had continued to reside in Glasgow, and had failed to submit to examination by the employers' medical man, there can be no doubt that the complainers would have been entitled to judgment; so that the question comes to be simply this—whether, having in view the circumstances of the case, the workman can be held to have refused, within the meaning of the section, to submit himself for examination by the practitioner provided by the employers. That depends on whether the requisition made by the complainers was a requisition which in the special circumstances they were entitled to insist on.

"The workman has provided himself with a registered memorandum, which certainly provides him with a prima facie right to the compensation agreed to, and it falls on the employers to shew why that compensation should not be paid. The employers are, it is true, authorised to require the workman to submit himself for examination. It does not follow that they are entitled to require him to go to the medical practitioner. In many cases of accident that would be impossible for the workman, often disabled by the accident, to comply with; or it would be unreasonable to ask him

Ordinary's interlocutor. (His Lordship stated the facts, and read portions of the letters dated 7th and 11th July 1904, which are quoted supra.) These letters shew the positions taken up by the complainers on the one side and the respondent on the other, and the question is which of these positions is the reasonable one. The complainers justify themselves under the 11th section of the 1st Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. (His Lordship read the section.)

Under the Act the obligation of the workman is confined to submitting himself to examination by the employer's doctor, and the question upon the construction of the Act is whether Kane refused to submit himself for examination, or obstructed the examination. It is to be observed that while it is the employer's right to select his own medical man, there is an obligation upon him to provide and pay the medical man so selected. This to do so if involving much suffering or danger of aggravating his injury. In such cases the employer might be under the necessity of sending his medical practitioner to the workman; and if he did not do so, but required the workman to go to the practitioner, it would be a question depending on the special circumstances whether the workman's non-compliance would amount to a refusal to submit himself for examination in the sense of the statute. That case is provided for in the Statutory Rules and Orders of 1898; but these do not seem to apply directly to the present case; but they assume the employers' liability in the circumstances to which they refer to send a medical practitioner to the workman where that is reasonable. In each case the question, I apprehend, would be what was reasonable.

"If the workman lived, say, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, but at some distance, I am not prepared to say that there might not be exceptional circumstances in which it might be held more reasonable to send the medical practitioner to him than to insist on the workman coming to Glasgow, or else to pay his expenses. I do not see that any absolute rule can be laid down.

"In this case the workman has gone to Ireland, not, as I understand, illegitimately, or with the object of evading medical examination—that is not stated—but simply, he says, because of his poverty. All the length the complainers go is to say, that he went to Ireland unnecessarily. Now, I do not think it would be reasonable to incur the expense of an inquiry on this point. The question can be settled more economically. The employers may, if they choose, employ a medical practitioner in Ireland within reasonable distance of the workman's residence, or they may pay the workman the expense of a visit to Glasgow and back. These are the employers' remedies. On the other hand, the workman has a remedy which is in some respects still cheaper. He may submit himself for examination to the nearest medical practitioner appointed under the Act. But then the Act does not require him to do that; and, if he does it, that carries the consequence that the certificate of the practitioner is final. I do not see that I can either add to the Act a prohibition of the workman to leave the neighbourhood so long as his injury continues, or convert the option which the statute gives him to apply to the medical referee into what would be practically an obligation to do so. I incline to think that in the circumstances the employers must provide and pay for a medical practitioner to whom the workman may have reasonable access without unreasonable expense.

"It is averred that the workman promised to return. But it is not averred that he promised to return at his own expense, and he is willing to return at his employers' cost; besides, I fail to see that the statutory appears to me to indicate an obligation upon the employer to select a medical man within a reasonable distance of the workman who is to be examined. There may be a question, but I do not think it arises in this case, as to what is meant by the words "submit himself." Is it enough for the workman when called upon to say "I am quite ready to submit myself for examination if you send your medical man to me at any reasonable time you choose"? That is one view of the meaning of the words, and if it is correct the workman here has never refused to "submit himself," for he has offered to submit himself for examination, as often as the employer likes, to anybody he chooses to send. The question would then be, if it were necessary to decide it here, whether the employer had complied sufficiently with the statute, and whether he was not only to select and pay a medical man, but to send him to the residence of the workman who was to be examined. I see nothing in the Act to shew that any duty is laid on the workman to go any distance—it may be a mile, or five miles, or, as in this case, two hundred miles—to be examined. But it is not necessary to decide that question. It is enough to consider whether what the employers did here was reasonable. The workman was entitled to go to Ireland, and he was entitled to say to the employer, "If you wish to have me examined you must select a medical man who is within my reach." There are plenty of qualified medical men in Ireland, and if the employer had chosen to select a medical man within this workman's reach, there is no doubt he would have gone and submitted himself to examination. Many cases might be put by way of illustration. One was suggested by Lord M'Laren. Suppose a man was injured in Scotland, and the employer wished that he should submit himself for examination by a London specialist. Would it be reasonable to demand that the workman should travel to London at his own expense? I think it would not. I think if the workman declined to do so he would not be refusing to submit himself to examination or obstructing examination in the sense of the Act. Has the workman done anything more unreasonable here? Having gone to Ireland to reside with his father, as he was entitled to do, he refused to come to Glasgow for examination at his own expense. I think he was not under any obligation to do so. No doubt the selection of the medical man lies with the employer.

penalty would be incurred by the workman's failure to keep his promise. It is only imposed for failure to fulfil a statutory duty; so that I do not think that this averment is important or must be sent to proof.

"A case called Finnie and Son v. Duncan [supra, p. 254] was quoted, decided on 13th December last. It had not appeared in any of the Reports, but through the courtesy of the reporters I was furnished with a note of the opinions of the Judges. I thought it, however, better to delay my judgment until the case was reported. It will be found now reported on p. 557 of the current volume (12 Scots Law Times). In that case the workman had gone to Australia without leaving his address, and neither his wife, whom he had left in Scotland, nor his former agents could discover it. In these circumstances the Court, under section 11, suspended the weekly payments, because he had made it impossible for the employer to avail himself of the machinery of the Act, and had obstructed the Act. But in this case there is no such impossibility, only some increase of difficulty and expense.

"I am, on the whole, of opinion that the case of Finnie does not apply, and that the respondent is entitled to judgment."

No. 82.
Jan. 28, 1905.
William Baird & Co., Limited, v. Kane.

But it is his duty to select one within reasonable reach of the man to be examined. If he does that, and the workman refuses to go, say two miles, to be examined by the medical practitioner, and says, "You must send your doctor to me," then a question of some difficulty might arise. But that is not the kind of case we have here. The employers have demanded that the workman should come from Ireland at his own expense, some 200 miles to Glasgow, to be examined by a medical man there who has been selected by them. I think that demand was not reasonable. The workman said he would come to Glasgow for examination if the employers would pay his expenses. That was quite reasonable.

On the facts of the case, and the construction of the Act, I think the Lord Ordinary was right, and that we should adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship. There are cases where we have found the clauses of the Workmen's Compensation Act somewhat obscure and difficult of interpretation, but in the present case I think the language is well chosen and admits of only one construction. Every word of the clause which has been the subject of criticism points to the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. I would observe that under the 11th section it is contemplated that the workman and the medical practitioner selected by the employer shall be brought together,—because it is only by a personal examination that a useful medical report can be given. While that is the contemplation of the Act, the duty laid on the workman is merely passive—he has to submit to such examination, while the duty laid on the employer is active—he has to provide and to pay the medical practitioner by whom the examination is to be conducted. That is a broad distinction which seems sufficient in itself to decide this case. But further I notice that not only is the practitioner to be provided by the employer, which according to the ordinary use of language would mean that he is to be brought to the spot and put into the position of making an examination, but he is to be paid by the employer, and I think that word was designedly selected so as to include not only the medical fee which in all cases would be required but also travelling or other expenses in case the employer thought that for his own advantage, or in the interests of justice, it was desirable to obtain the opinion of a medical expert from a distance.

Then the question is, whether this workman, who had gone to Ireland—legitimately as the Lord Ordinary has found—because he was unable to work and had been invited to go and reside with his father—the question is whether this man, who had gone to Ireland, not for any purpose of obstructing medical examination, but for a lawful purpose, can be required to travel to Glasgow in order to be examined by a medical expert selected by his employer. I cannot think that the direction to submit to examination can include an obligation to make a long journey to a place selected by the employer, a journey which in many cases of injury to person could not be undertaken without possible risk to health, to say nothing of the expense, which is always an important consideration to a disabled and impoverished workman. There must be cases where it is difficult to satisfy both parties in making a selection of an examining medical practitioner—a gentleman whose report would have the concurrence of both parties; and this is provided for by an examination by a medical referee selected by a public authority. But in the present case the parties do not differ upon any question as to the suitability of the medical practitioner. The respondent is quite willing to submit himself to examination by a doctor selected by the employer, if the employer will either appoint a doctor in Ireland, or pay the workman's expenses of going to Glasgow to be examined, and therefore I cannot hold that there has been any obstruction to an examination—any more than that there was a refusal to submit himself. I would only add this, that while under the obligation to provide and pay for medical examination, I think the duty is put upon the employer of bringing the medical practitioner to the place if he is not resident in the vicinity of the workman's home, this must always be construed with regard to professional usage and etiquette. If, for example, a statute directed the person to submit himself to examination upon the facts of the case by a legal commissioner appointed by the Court or the Sheriff, I should hold that it was the duty of the workman, if health permitted, to attend on the commissioner, because it is the usage of the profession that a party who is to be examined always goes to the judicial authority. If the injury is not of a disabling kind, if it does not prevent the man walking to the doctor's residence, then I think he must do what all other patients do, go to the doctor if able to do so, though doctors are always willing, if there is the slightest need for it, to attend at the house of the patient. But where the doctor is at a distance, then I think the case is different, because I could not stretch the code of medical practice further than that a man may be required to attend at the medical practitioner's house where he is a resident practitioner. But that does not imply any duty on the part of the workman to travel at his own expense in order to be examined by a medical practitioner at a distance from the place where he is residing.

Lord Kinnear.—I quite agree with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. My only doubt is whether it might not be sufficient to substitute for the somewhat numerous findings of the Lord Ordinary the respondent's own way of putting his case, which I think is perfectly satisfactory, as it is embodied in the second plea in law. The ground of judgment, in my opinion, is quite well stated there,—"The respondent not having refused to submit himself to medical examination, and not having obstructed the same, the complainers were not entitled to suspend the weekly payments of compensation due to him." I think that both of these two propositions in fact, which form the basis of the plea, are perfectly well made out, for the reasons your Lordships have already given. The respondent submitted twice to examination. So long as he was in the same place as the medical man, and the complainers desired to have him examined, he made no difficulty. He was called on to submit to examination on 16th December 1903. He was called on to do so again on 24th March 1904, and again submitted himself, and the only occasion on which he has declined to come to the doctor for examination is the occasion on which he was asked to come from Ireland to Glasgow, or to a place in Dumbartonshire, at his own expense in order to be examined by this medical practitioner. I agree that it was not reasonable to ask him to do so, and therefore the complainers have not satisfied the obligation laid on them by the statute in order to enforce his attendance which is that they have in a reasonable sense "provided" a doctor by whom he is to be examined. I think the distinction between the present case and the case of Finnie (supra, p. 254) is perfectly obvious, and it is quite rightly pointed out by the Lord Ordinary when he says that in Finnie's case the man had gone to Australia without leaving his address with anybody, leaving his wife at home, and neither his wife nor his former law-agents were able to find out where the man had gone to. That was held to be an obstruction to the operation of the statute, because it was impossible to find out the man and make any provision for examination. But in the present case there would not have been the slightest difficulty in the employer discovering a qualified practitioner where the workman was living, or if they could not find a qualified practitioner at the place where he was living, they could have found one within a reasonable distance. I think that in asking the respondent to come from Ireland to Glasgow at his own expense the employers were making an unreasonable demand.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

WILLIAM MARTIN GRIFFITH, a native of British Guiana, died upon 9th July 1903. He left a will, dated 11th August 1891, which had been executed in British Guiana, and by which he appointed John Henry Brathwaite and M'Lean Ogle his executors.

Griffith, who was illegitimate, came to Scotland in 1891, and spent the remaining years of his life in Scotland. He died possessed of heritable property in Glasgow valued at £2000.

The following were the terms of the will:—

"Last Will and Testament—Colony of British Guiana. No. 83.

Jan. 31, 1905. Griffith's Judicial Factor v. Griffith's Executors.

"In the name of God. Amen.—Be it known that I, William Martin Griffith, residing in the city of Georgetown, county of Demerara, and Colony above named, being about to leave the Colony, and in order to prevent any doubts or disputes arising after my demise as to the disposition of my effects in and out of the Colony, do make, publish, and declare this to be my last will and testament, hereby expressly revoking all former wills and codicils, and I now order as follows, viz.:—

"(Firstly) I request that all my funeral expenses and just and lawful debts be paid as soon after my demise as possible.

"(Secondly) I will and bequeath to my brother, John Henry Brathwaite, my sister, Mary Rose Beete (born Lynch), and my unborn babe (mother Blanche Exepha Chapman), all my effects, to be divided equally between the three as soon as possible after my demise.

"In the event of the first (my brother) dying, his portion must go to his present wife and her heirs.

"In the event of the second (my sister) dying, her portion must go to her children; and in the event of my unborn babe dying, its portion must go to its mother, above named.

"(Thirdly) I nominate, constitute, and appoint John Henry Brathwaite and M'Lean Ogle as executors, with power of assumption, substitution, and surrogation."

On 29th August 1903, William Yair Chrystal, chartered accountant, Glasgow, was appointed judicial factor on the deceased's estate, and on 21st January 1904 he raised an action of multiplepoinding in which the fund in medio was the deceased's heritable property in Glasgow, and the rents thereof.

The Lord Advocate, as representing the Crown as ultimus hæres, claimed the whole fund in medio, and pleaded;—(1) The deceased William Martin Griffith having died leaving no heir intestate quoad his Scottish heritage, this claimant should be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim. (2) The succession to the deceased's Scottish heritage falling to be determined, and the deceased's will falling to be construed, according to the law of Scotland, and said will not being habile to convey said Scottish heritage, this claimant should be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

Brathwaite and Ogle, the deceased's executors, also claimed the whole fund in medio, and averred, inter alia,—(Cond. 2) "The domicile of the deceased William Martin Griffith at the date of his death was British Guiana. He was a native of that country, and, though in Scotland for some years prior to his death, he did not lose his domicile of origin or acquire a Scottish domicile." (Cond. 3) "The will of the said William Martin Griffith is effectual to carry heritage in Scotland. It is effectual to dispose of real estate in British Guiana, where it was made. The document falls to be construed according to the law of British Guiana. The said will purports to dispose of the testator's whole 'effects in and out of the Colony' of British Guiana. According to the law of the said Colony the term 'effects' includes the whole estate, whether real or personal, and wheresoever situated, belonging to the testator. By that law, the will validly disposes of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, which belonged to the deceased. The averments of the other claimant, in so far as not coinciding herewith, are denied."

They pleaded;—The will of the late William Martin Griffith

Jan. 31, 1905. Griffith's Judicial Factor v. Griffith's Executors.

On 17th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) repelled the executors' claim, and ranked and preferred the Lord Advocate to the whole fund in medio.*

* "OPINION.—The question here is whether a will executed by the deceased William Martin Griffith in British Guiana, and dated 11th August 1891, is habile to dispose of certain heritable property in Glasgow which belonged to him at his death on 9th July 1903. The will appointed two gentlemen as 'executors,' and purported to dispose of the testator's whole 'effects in and out of the colony' of British Guiana. He was a native of that colony, and he is said by his executors never to have lost his domicile of origin, although he left Guiana in 1891 and spent the last years of his life in Scotland.

"The fund in medio consists of his heritable estate in Glasgow, together with the accruing rents, and the competition is between the executors under the will and the Crown as ultimus hæres, Mr Griffith having been illegitimate. The executors maintain that the will ought to be construed according to the law of British Guiana, and that by that law the term 'effects' includes the whole estate, whether real or personal, and wheresoever situated, belonging to the testator. The Lord Advocate, on the other hand, maintains that the will falls to be construed according to the law of Scotland, as the law which regulates all questions affecting the succession to the testator's Scottish heritage.

"Now, the question whether a foreign will was intended to pass and does pass heritable estate in Scotland is, primarily at all events, a question of Scots law. This depends not only on a well-settled rule of international law, but upon section 20 of the Titles to Land Act of 1868, by which it was for the first time made possible to settle the succession to heritable subjects in Scotland by testament; for the first requirement of any such testament is that it shall 'purport to convey or bequeath' Scottish lands. Similarly, in a later part of the section, which substitutes for the old words of style in a conveyance of Scottish lands such words as would be sufficient to confer upon an executor a right to moveables, it is provided that the words must be used 'with reference to such lands.' If this be a question to be determined by the law of Scotland, there can be no doubt of the answer, for it has been twice decided (Pitcairn, 8 Macph. 604, and Edmond, 11 Macph. 348) that the word 'effects' is not sufficient to carry heritage.

"But then the executors maintain that the thing to be got at is the intention of a testator who made his will in a foreign country, and they offer to prove that by the law of that foreign country the term 'effects' would include the testator's whole estate of every description. They also point to the fact that the term 'effects' was followed by the words 'in and out of the colony,' which, they say, must have been intended to cover real estate, inasmuch as mobilia situm non habent. I am not sure whether this argument is used as strengthening the likelihood that the law of British Guiana would pronounce the will as habile to carry heritage, or whether it is urged as a reason why even a Scottish Court should declare it to have that effect. If it be used for the latter purpose, then I must decline to ascribe so important an effect to the words 'in and out of the colony.' While it may be true in a legal sense that personal estate has no locality, there is a popular and very real sense in which it has, and that is the sense in which the testator must be understood as having described his 'effects' as both in and out of the colony. I cannot imagine any testator who really wished to affect his real estate describing it in so obscure a fashion.

"Studd v. Cook, 10 R. (H. L.) 53, was the only case on which the executors were able to found as at all supporting the strange proposition that a

The executors reclaimed, and argued;—The claimants were entitled to prove their averment, that by the law of British Guiana the will was effectual to dispose of heritage. The decisions on section 20 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, to which the Lord Ordinary attached so much weight, were not conclusive of the present question. The question here was, what did the testator intend to convey? To arrive at the testator's intention it was necessary to ascertain the interpretation of the words used in the will according to the law of British Guiana, because that was the system of law which was present to the testator's mind when his will was made.[1] A will made in the place of the testator's domicile must be interpreted according to the lex domicilii.[2] The rule applied both to moveable and immoveable property, unless it could be clearly shewn from the terms used in the will that the testator had in view the law of the place where the immoveable property was situated.[3] There was no such indication here. It was admitted that inquiry was necessary where the will was expressed in a foreign language; it was equally necessary where, as here, an established principle of construction by the foreign Court was averred.[4] After the inquiry had been made it would still be for the Court to construe the will.

Argued for the Lord Advocate, claimant and respondent;—The will was expressed in ordinary language, it contained no technical words, and there was no relevant averment of any technical rule of construction peculiar to the law of British Guiana. There was therefore no

Scottish Court is not to decide for itself the question whether Scottish land is carried by a foreign will, but is to resort to the Courts of the country where the will was executed to determine that question, even although the words to be construed are simple English words, and not terms of art. But Studd v. Cook when properly examined affords no countenance to such a proposition. The will under construction in that case purported to convey Scottish lands in express terms about which there could be no dubiety, and the only purpose for which English law was invoked was to interpret certain technical words of English conveyancing in order that they might be translated into the nearest analogue afforded by the law of Scotland. That is all that Lord Watson really meant when he spoke (at p. 61) of the Legislature having intended that the intention of the testator should be 'gathered from the whole context of the will interpreted by the rules of English law.' Indeed, his Lordship treated the whole question as turning on the provisions of section 20 of the Titles to Land Act; and one of the curious results of the executors' argument would be that the construction of an Act relating to Scotland should be relegated to the Courts of a foreign country. I quite admit that if this will had been expressed in a foreign language, or had used technical words unintelligible in Scotland, it would have been competent and necessary to resort to the lex loci actus for their interpretation. But there are no such words in this will. The primary question is whether it 'purports to convey or bequeath lands' in Scotland, and that is a question for the Courts of Scotland, and for no other.

"I shall therefore sustain the claim of the Crown and repel the claim of the executors."

room for inquiry, and the will must be construed according to the law of Scotland.[1] It was admitted that "effects" could not carry heritage in Scotland, and there was nothing in the will to shew that heritage was in the testator's mind, e.g., no power was given to sell, and the bequest was not to trustees, but to executors only.[2] The question whether heritage was carried by a will was ruled by the lex situs.[3] The passage in Story[4] relied on by the reclaimers was much too widely stated, and was not supported by the authorities cited.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This case comes before us on a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of Lord Stormonth-Darling, and it relates to the disposal of the heritable estate in Scotland of the late William Martin Griffiths, who was a native of British Guiana, but had latterly resided for some time in Scotland. He left a will, executed in British Guiana, the subject of the argument here, by which he appointed executors, but it was found advisable to appoint a judicial factor for the administration of the executry estate, and he has raised this action of multiplepoinding. The claimants are the executors appointed under the will, who claim the whole estate of the deceased, and the Lord Advocate, who appears for the Crown as ultimus hæres and claims the heritable estate in Scotland as not effectually disposed of by the terms of the will. It appears that Mr Griffiths was illegitimate, and failing lawful issue any estate undisposed of by him would fall to the Crown as ultimus hæres. The will itself is brief and clear in its terms, and is expressed in ordinary language. In it the testator sets forth that, being about to leave the Colony, he has made this will "in order to prevent any doubts or disputes arising after my demise as to the disposition of my effects in and out of the Colony." There is nothing in the will in the nature of a conveyance to executors, but I assume that this was not necessary. Then he proceeds to dispose of his "effects" to certain beneficiaries, and the will concludes with a clause of substitution in the event of the deaths of any of the beneficiaries, and a nomination of executors. I remark on the use of the word "effects" that it appears to have been deliberately chosen, for it is the only word employed both in the narrative clause and in the clause disposing of the testator's property; and what we have to consider is whether a will, expressed as this one is in ordinary language and purporting to devise "effects," is available as a disposition of heritable estate in Scotland. It was alleged for the executors that by the law of Guiana a will so expressed is a valid disposition of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, of the testator, and we were asked to ascertain the law of the Colony for the purpose of determining the meaning of the will. In considering the decisions relating to the effect of foreign law with respect to testamentary bequests, it is necessary to keep in mind that this branch of law, like some others, must be considered historically, and note must be taken of the steps in the development of the principles that have come to be established. It is impossible to solve a question of this kind by referring only to the older decisions, or by quoting isolated expressions from the works of the text writers. The law as finally formulated may be taken to be in terms of the judgment in the case of the Duchess Di Sora v. Phillips,[1] and that exposition of it has been recognised as sound both in the House of Lords and in the Judicial Committee. It is to the effect that it is always for the Court of construction or administration to interpret a will expressed in ordinary language. If the will is not expressed altogether in ordinary language, then the Court may, if necessary, have a translation of the will, and may have evidence or an opinion explanatory of any terms of art in it, and of any rules of foreign law that may take effect upon it. With such assistance it is the function of the Court to construe the will for itself. The only point on which the parties are at variance is as to the meaning of the word "effects." Now, I am of opinion that, regarded as a question of intention, a will that disposes of a man's "effects" is not a disposition or devise of his heritable property. No one in correspondence or in conversation would ever describe landed property as "effects." No one who had bought a house would say, "I have purchased some effects in Princes Street." Now, in construing this will we have to follow no other rule than to give to the testator's words their ordinary meaning, and to interpret the will according to its grammatical significance and according to the ordinary use of the words employed. Therefore if the will is to be construed by this Court, I am of opinion that it is not expressed in terms which are effectual to operate as a conveyance of heritable property in Scotland.

We have, however, to consider whether there are any relevant averments as to the effect of foreign law, which would have to be ascertained before we could proceed to construe the will. It is to be noted that there is no averment that the word "effects" has, according to the jurisprudence of this British Colony, any technical meaning, nor is it said that there is any rule of law of the Colony which would have the effect of making a will which only purports to dispose of moveable estate effective to convey heritable estate in Scotland. As to the first of these I do not suppose that the word "effects" is a word of technical meaning under any system of law; but that point does not require to be considered, as there is not here any relevant averment to that effect. As to the second point, I do not think that in dealing with estate within the territory we are at liberty to give effect to a rule of foreign law so as to include within the provisions of a will more than appears on the face of it to be dealt with. The result of all the decisions is to the effect that, for the transference of heritage in this country, a foreign will, however clearly expressed, is not operative to prevent the lex situs from deciding whether heritable estate has or has not been validly conveyed. I do not find here any sufficiently definite averment that a will, which on the face of it is only valid to carry personalty in this country, is really by the operation of foreign law effectual as a conveyance of heritage. The averments are altogether too vague to entitle us to institute an inquiry for our guidance in construing this will, and it is contrary to settled practice to put the interpretation of a will affecting heritage in Scotland into the hands of a foreign expert, which is practically what we are asked to do in this case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, and for the reasons given by Lord M'Laren. I think, indeed, that there was force in Mr Campbell's argument that the consideration to which the Lord Ordinary has attached so much weight—to wit, that it is for this Court to construe the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868,—is not conclusive, because all that that statute requires is that in order to bequeath land words of bequest must be used in reference to such lands "which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient" to convey such moveables, and therefore the consequence of the statute which it is said that it is for us alone to construe is simply that we must go on to construe the terms of a will executed in British Guiana. I therefore assent to the argument that the Conveyancing Act of 1868 is out of the way. I must also assent to the proposition which was stated by the reclaimers' counsel to the effect that where a will is executed in a foreign country by a person domiciled in that country, it must be interpreted according to the law of that country. It was so laid down by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Trotter v. Trotter,[1] and I think we must accept it as a general rule. But then also I consider, as was pointed out by Lord M'Laren, that when a will, which is written in ordinary language, contains no technical words, and is not subject to any technical rule of construction by the law of the place where it is made, the intention of the testator must be gathered from the instrument by the Judge of any Court conversant with the language in which the will is written. We cannot refuse to construe a will written in ordinary English language, or remit the question of its interpretation to a foreign Court or to foreign experts. It was decided in Thomson's Trustees v. Alexander[2] that as soon as it is ascertained that the will is written in ordinary language the Court must take the construction upon itself, and is not to defer to the opinion of foreign experts. It is true that in that case the Court first ascertained by reference to English counsel that there was no technical rule of English law to govern the interpretation of the will; but then every reference to foreign counsel or to an English Court necessarily involves a preliminary decision that there is matter which falls to be determined by foreign law, and is not capable of construction in this Court. This was clearly the case in Trotter v. Trotter,[1] on which the reclaimers' counsel relied. The question was as to the sufficiency of words of conveyance in an Indian will to carry real property in India, and Lord Cuninghame says, —"No one who looks at the case could doubt that the legal construction of Colonel Trotter's will was unintelligible to any but an English lawyer. It was as purely a technical question of English law as ever was submitted to a Court." I agree with Lord M'Laren that if there had been in this case any relevant averment of any technical rule of construction peculiar to the law of British Guiana, inquiry might have been necessary, but nothing of that kind is suggested. I cannot agree with the reclaimers' argument that the word "effects" has a technical meaning peculiar to the law of Scotland, or that any such technical meaning has been recognised by the decisions in this Court. The word is one of ordinary language, and has been construed in the decisions according to its ordinary meaning. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this will is expressed in ordinary language, and that there is no relevant averment that it contains any technical terms, or that it must be construed in accordance with any technical canon of construction peculiar to the place where it was made. I think we are bound to construe the will according to its plain meaning, and so construing it I agree with the Lord Ordinary and Lord M'Laren.

TONI TYRES, LIMITED, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and having its registered office at 212 Shaftesbury Avenue, London, and Francesco Toni, 56 Berners Street, London, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Palmer Tyre, Limited, having its registered office at 15 Martineau Street, Birmingham, and carrying on business at Silvertown, London, and 8 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.

The prayer of the note craved the Court to interdict the respondents from manufacturing, selling, disposing, or using within Scotland any pneumatic tyres with wheel rims and means of attaching pneumatic tyres to wheel rims, made in accordance with the invention described in the specification filed relative to certain letters-patent, numbered 17,787, and dated 13th August 1903, and granted to the complainer Toni, and from infringing in any manner of way within Scotland the rights and privileges granted by said letters-patent.

The interdict originally craved extended to Great Britain and Ireland, but by an amendment made and allowed in the Procedure-roll, the interdict sought was limited to Scotland.

Interim interdict was of consent refused by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills upon the respondents undertaking to keep an account, and the note was passed under reservation of the respondents' plea against jurisdiction. Thereafter a record was made up and closed before Lord Stormonth-Darling.

The complainers, after setting forth the nature of their invention, averred (Stat. 2) that the respondents "were at the date of the presentation of the note exhibiting and offering for sale tyres with wheel rims and flanges of a similar description at a motor and cycle show being held in the Waverley Market, Edinburgh. They had a stall at that show with a large sign-board bearing the respondents' name. They had there a large supply of tyres and tyre attachments and other goods, and they solicited and took orders there for the sale thereof. They also distributed their catalogues at the show and throughout Scotland, and they offered for sale tyres and rims made according to the said flange attachment to many persons at the show and also throughout Scotland, by correspondence and otherwise. . . . The respondents carry on business at 8 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Their name is on a brass plate at the side of the entrance door. They keep a stock of Palmer tyres and other goods there for sale. Orders sent to them there are executed by them, and invoices are sent out to the purchasers in name of the respondents. They announce in their trade catalogues that they have a branch depot there, and also a registered telegraphic address, viz., 'Silvergray, Glasgow,' and that they are on the telephone in Glasgow at that address. They are entered in the Glasgow Post-Office Directory, with their sanction, as having a warehouse there. In point of fact, they are on the telephone in Glasgow, and have a postal, telegraphic, and telephonic address at 8 Buchanan Street there. The note of suspension and interdict was served on the respondents there, and also at the registered office of the Company, and a copy sent to their known agents."

The respondents in their answers denied that they had infringed the complainers' letters-patent, and averred;—(Ans. 2) " . . . The respondents have no office or place of business in Scotland, and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. In particular, they have no office or place of business at 8 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, where the pretended intimation or service of the present note of suspension and interdict was made. In any event, the Courts of Scotland are not a convenient forum for adjudicating upon the subject-matter of the present action. The complainers and respondents are both English companies, and are both subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts, in which the respondents are ready and willing to answer any writ or action which the complainers may bring against them with reference to the subject-matter of the present process. Further, all, or nearly all, the necessary witnesses and the whole documents, plans, models, &c., relative to the case are in England, the Courts of which country accordingly afford the most convenient forum for the adjudication of all questions arising under the present action."

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—1. The respondents are subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in respect that—(1) At the date of presentation of the note, they were carrying on business in Scotland, and had a warehouse, branch depot, postal, telegraphic, and telephonic address, at 8 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. (2) At said date, they were offering for sale, at a stall in the exhibition in Edinburgh, tyres and attachments made in contravention of the com-plainers' patent, and by the circulation of their trade catalogues, and by correspondence, they were offering such for sale in Scotland generally. (3) The Court in Scotland is the proper Court to grant interdict within Scotland against the continuance of the wrongdoing complained of.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—1. The Court has no jurisdiction over the respondents. 2. Forum non conveniens. 3. The interdict craved should be refused, in respect that the alleged letters-patent founded on are, and have from the date thereof been null and void and invalid, in respect—(a) that the alleged inventor was not the true and first inventor of the alleged inventions; (b) that the said alleged inventions were published and publicly known prior to the date of the said alleged letters-patent; and (c) that the specifications do not distinguish between what was published and publicly known prior to their dates, and what was new, if anything. 4. The respondents not having infringed the alleged letters-patent founded on by the complainers, interdict should be refused.

On 15th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) repelled the first and second pleas in law for the respondents, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the plea of no jurisdiction.—The respondents were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. They were an English Company, and had no place of business in Scotland. The averment that they carried on business in Scotland was not enough.[1] In order to found jurisdiction against a foreigner in Scotland either arrestment or personal service was neces-

* "OPINION.—The averment that the respondents are subject to the jurisdiction of this Court in respect of their having a place of business in Scotland is certainly rather bare. At the same time, in a proceeding of this kind it is probably sufficient, for I read it as meaning that the respondents have a right to the possession of heritage in Scotland. If that had been the only ground of jurisdiction averred, I should at present have limited the proof to the question of jurisdiction. As it is, I am not prepared to restrict the proof in that way, if the complainers are ready to amend their prayer so as to limit the scope of the interdict craved to Scotland. The remedy sought is purely preventive. It is not petitory or declaratory. It is directed purely to prevent the respondents repeating a delict or quasi-delict, which the complainer says the respondents have in the past committed in Scotland. In an action ratione delicti, for the purpose of preventing the repetition of a delict, I cannot doubt that the Courts of the territory have jurisdiction over a foreigner, though he be not found within the territory. It is necessary he should be so found when the ground of the action is founded on contract, but not when the ground is a delict or quasi-delict, and the remedy asked is purely preventive. Waygood's (12 R. 651) case is authority for that, and it is not inconsistent with the other judgments cited, such as Kermick v. Watson (9 Macph. 984), where the quasi-delict was a slander, and where the jurisdiction of the Sheriff would not have been sustained if the defender had not been served within the county, for the jurisdiction of the Sheriff over foreigners on this ground never extends to the case where the foreigner is not cited within the sheriffdom. The cases are therefore not inconsistent, and the principles of international law are in favour of allowing jurisdiction though there has been no personal service within the country."

sary.[1] In the case of Waygood v. Bennie,[2] which was relied on by the complainers, leave had been given by the English Courts to serve the writ in Scotland, and the service was therefore statutory. The real question at issue here was the validity of the patent, and in order to try that question in the Court of Session, it was necessary to found jurisdiction against a foreigner in the ordinary way. It was not disputed that there was a preventive jurisdiction in the Bill-Chamber to prevent the continuance of a quasi-delict, but that jurisdiction was confined to the Bill-Chamber and could not be extended to the Court of Session, otherwise the ordinary rules as to the founding of jurisdiction in the Court of Session could be evaded in any action where interdict was a competent proceeding. The preventive jurisdiction of the Bill-Chamber gave a summary remedy against a wrong done in Scotland irrespective of the domicile of the wrongdoer, but this summary process was quite inappropriate for determining questions of right. As a matter of fact even if interdict were granted in this case it could not be enforced, because, in a petition and complaint for breach of interdict, personal service on the respondent was necessary. The mere fact of passing the note did not confer jurisdiction on the Court of Session to deal with the question of right.[3] (2) On the plea of forum non conveniens.—The Court in England was the appropriate forum in which to try the question in dispute. The parties were both resident in England. Evidence as to the validity of the patent could be more conveniently obtained in England, and evidence of infringement was equally available there. The patent was a British one, and an injunction obtained in England would be effective over the whole area to which the patent applied. An interdict or injunction was not necessarily limited to the country in which it was obtained, though its enforcement outside the jurisdiction might be a matter of difficulty.[4] The case should be dismissed or sisted to allow of an action being brought in England.[5]

Argued for the complainers;—(1) On the plea of no jurisdiction.—The Court had jurisdiction to prevent wrong being done by foreigners to foreigners in Scotland. The rule with regard to personal service applied only to cases of contract. The cases quoted on the other side made this clear. This was a case of quasi-delict, and personal service was not necessary in order to get a purely preventive remedy against a continuance of the wrong.[6] Personal service could not be made upon a limited company. Service had been made at the registered office of the Company in England, and at their office in Glasgow, and this was the only way in which service could be made. The interdict sought could be enforced otherwise than by imprisonment, e.g., by an action for damages. There was no preventive jurisdiction in the Bill-Chamber as distinguished from the Court of Session. The complainer had to go through the Bill-Chamber if he wanted interim interdict, but the jurisdiction was the same whether it was exercised in the Bill-Chamber or the Court of Session. (2) On the plea of forum non conveniens.—The Court of Session was the appropriate forum in which to seek interdict against a wrong which was being done in Scotland. An injunction obtained in England could not be enforced in Scotland without a supplementary action. The respondent had not shewn that any injustice would result from the case being tried in Scotland.[1]

LORD ADAM.—This is a suspension brought at the instance of a firm called Toni Tyres, Limited, which is an English company having its office in London. The suspension is brought against another English company, The Palmer Tyre, Limited, having its registered office in Birmingham, and said to be carrying on business in London and in Buchanan Street, Glasgow. The prayer of the petition is that the complainers seek to have the respondents interdicted and prohibited during the continuance of certain letters-patent "from manufacturing, selling . . . any pneumatic tyres with wheel rims, and means of attaching pneumatic tyres to wheel rims, made in accordance with the invention described in the specification filed relatively to the letters-patent, and from directly or indirectly using . . . the invention in . . . Scotland"; so that it has to be observed that the effect of the interdict would be limited entirely to Scotland—it would not interfere with anything beyond Scotland. (His Lordship then stated the averments made in regard to the patent and infringement.)

Now, that is all they say in respect of the patent and the infringement. Then they go on to say that the respondents carry on business at 8 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, and have a place of business there. In answer to that there is no denial by the respondents that they did propose to sell these tyres in Scotland. They then set forth that their attachment differs from that of the other Company, but I need not go into that, for that is on the merits, and in particular they deny that they have a place of business in Glasgow, and then they say that "in any event, the Courts of Scotland are not a convenient forum for adjudicating upon the subject-matter of the present action. The complainers and respondents are both English companies, and are both subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts, in which the respondents are ready and willing to answer any writ or action which the complainers may bring against them with reference to the subject-matter of the present process."

These are the averments and the counter averments set forth in this note of suspension, and upon these the respondents have two pleas in law. The first is that the Court has no jurisdiction over the respondents, and the second is that the Court of this country is not a forum conveniens. The Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor has repelled both these pleas, and allowed a proof, and the question is whether his Lordship's interlocutor is right.

Now, this question of jurisdiction was founded by the complainers upon two grounds—the first being that the respondents had in point of law a place of business in Glasgow, and the second was that stated in the third subdivision of the first plea,—"The Court in Scotland is the proper Court to grant interdict within Scotland against the continuance of the wrong-doing complained of." These are the two pleas as to the jurisdiction. The Lord Ordinary in disposing of these pleas does not sustain the jurisdiction on the first, as to the place of business, because he says that, as a question of fact, that would need to be inquired into. But he says the third plea—the plea I have just read—is a sound plea, and has given effect to it. Now, it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary is right. If the complainers' statements are true—and we must assume them to be true at this stage of the case—a wrong has been done, and it being done in Scotland I think it would be singular if the Courts of Scotland had not jurisdiction to prevent that wrong being continued. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no analogy between jurisdiction in cases of delict or quasi-delict and a case of contract. In this case the effect of the jurisdiction is confined entirely to Scotland. The alleged illegal acts are being done in Scotland, and the object of the suspension is to stop these illegal acts being done in Scotland. I accordingly agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says,—"The remedy sought is purely preventive; it is not petitory or declaratory. It is directed purely to prevent the respondents repeating a delict or quasi-delict which the complainers say the respondents have in the past committed in Scotland. In an action ratione delicti for the purpose of preventing the repetition of a delict, I cannot doubt that the Courts of the territory have jurisdiction over a foreigner, though he be not found within the territory." I entirely agree with that statement, and I think the Lord Ordinary has rightly sustained the plea of jurisdiction on the ground that he has done. Then as to the plea of forum non conveniens. If the Lord Ordinary is right in sustaining the jurisdiction, it humbly appears to me that the forum to which this application is made was not only a forum conveniens, but the only appropriate forum before which to bring it. On these grounds, I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

Lord M'Laren.—It is a proposition recognised not only in our jurisprudence, but I think all over the world, that patent rights, rights to the exclusive privilege of working an invention, are in the fullest sense rights of property. They are capable of being transferred for valuable consideration or otherwise disposed of, just like any other incorporeal right of property. An infringement of a patent right is therefore an invasion of private property, and is, I think, rightly described in the Lord Ordinary's judgment as quasi-delict. Now, when an action is brought in this country alleging interference with the rights of property in a patent, and stating reasonable grounds for apprehending that such infringement will be continued, I think the Courts of this country have jurisdiction in regard to such an action—in other words, to exercise what is called preventive jurisdiction. The question is so elementary that I do not think it can be made clearer by argument or illustration, but our decision results from the general function of the Courts of every country to exercise their authority so that law and order may be maintained within the territory of the Court.

But further, it appears to me that in this case the Courts of Scotland are the only Courts that have power to prevent the continuance of this alleged illegal course of action, because no injunction or interdict granted by any other Court could be enforced in this country without a supplementary application to the Courts of this country, which would just be doing by a circuitous method what is now proposed, and I think rightly, to be done directly. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

LORD LOW.—I have no doubt that when a delict or quasi-delict is committed in Scotland the Court has jurisdiction to protect the injured party.

Such jurisdiction, however, requires in the case of foreigners to be carefully exercised. It ought not, in my judgment, to be extended beyond the necessities of the particular case, and it ought to be invoked in an appropriate form of proceeding.

The respondents' counsel supposed the case of the complainers having, instead of bringing a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber, raised an action in the Court of Session for declarator that their patent was valid, and for interdict against the respondents selling the protected article.

It may be (I express no opinion on this point) that the plea of no jurisdiction would have fallen to be sustained in such an action, because it would have been the appropriate form of action for having the general question of the complainers' rights as holders of the patent determined, and would not have been an appropriate proceeding if all that the complainers desired was to be protected against an alleged wrong which had been done to them in Scotland.

But for the latter purpose a note of suspension and interdict is a proper and recognised form of proceeding, and one in which the Court has a large discretion in regard to the extent of the remedy which ought to be given.

It may be, and often is, competent and expedient to determine in a note of suspension and interdict questions of right or of title which might properly be made the subject of an action of declarator. On the other hand, the Court may, and frequently does, refuse to do more in a note of suspension and interdict than make interim regulations until the question of right or title can be determined in an appropriate action.

Such a course might have been adopted in this very case if the circumstances had rendered it expedient or possible. For example, if it had appeared that either of the parties was about to raise proceedings in the English Courts to have the question of the validity of the patent tried, then I think that the present note might very well have been sisted to await the result of the English action, interim interdict being granted in the meantime, or an obligation taken from the respondents in such terms as would have kept the complainers free from loss in the event of their establishing that the patent was good.

But that is not at all the position of matters here. Neither party proposes to take proceedings in England, and neither party is bound to do so. The position taken up by the respondents is simply that because they are foreigners and jurisdiction has not been founded against them by arrestment or personal service in Scotland, the Scottish Courts cannot take cog-nisance of anything which they have done or may threaten to do in Scotland. The argument would have been equally applicable if the respondents had admitted both the validity of the patent and its infringement by them. But in that case it seems to me that it would be intolerable if the Court was impotent to prevent a repetition of the admitted wrong. The only difference, however, between that case and the present is that here the respondents say that the patent is not valid.

I do not think that it can be maintained that the jurisdiction of the Courts to give protection against an alleged wrong depends upon whether the wrong is admitted or denied.

Whether the plea that the patent is not valid is or is not well founded cannot be ascertained without investigation, but I imagine that the patent must be presumed to be good until the contrary is proved. I therefore do not see how any other course could be followed except that adopted by the Lord Ordinary. As I have indicated, if the main issue which had been raised had been the validity of the patent for any purpose and for any country which it embraces, the plea of no jurisdiction might have been sustained, even although the occasion of bringing the action had been an infringement of the patent in Scotland.

But the question raised in the present proceeding is confined to this—Whether the respondents have committed a wrong against the complainers in Scotland alone, and whether they are entitled to be protected against a repetition of that wrong in Scotland? I am of opinion that that is a question which this Court has necessarily jurisdiction to entertain and to dispose of, and that it is immaterial that, owing to the position taken up by the respondents, it is necessary in order to determine that question, to inquire incidentally whether or not the patent is valid.

In regard to the plea of forum non conveniens, I think that what I have said shews that it is in no way applicable to a case of this kind.

I am therefore of opinion that the Court should refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

1st Division.

John Scrymgeour Hepburn, Town-clerk of the Royal Burgh of Rothesay, who had been appointed to that office on 7th December 1903, presented a petition, in which he stated,—"It is the duty of town-clerks of royal burghs, in which are kept Burgh Registers of Sasines, to register all deeds appropriate and presented for registration in said Burgh Register, and to keep and authenticate minutes of such deeds in the Minute-books of the Register. No. 85.

Feb. 3, 1905. Hepburn.

"On entering upon the duties of his office the petitioner discovered that the minute of a deed presented for registration on 19th March 1896, and all the minutes of deeds presented for registration between and including 1st April 1896 and 7th February 1901, and between and including 3d March 1902 and 10th March 1902, although entered in the Minute-books, had not been authenticated by the signature of the town-clerk of the burgh for the time being. The number of these deeds unauthenticated is 434."

The petitioner craved the Court "to authorise the petitioner to authenticate and subscribe the minutes entered in the Minute-books of the Burgh Register of Sasines of the Royal Burgh of Rothesay," on and between the dates mentioned, "and any other minute or minutes which may hereafter be discovered not to have been subscribed by the town-clerk for the time being, to the same effect as the said town-clerk for the time being might have done himself, and to authorise the petitioner to record this petition and any warrant following thereon in the said Burgh Register of Sasines."

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the petition, and heard counsel for the petitioner, grant the prayer thereof, and decern."

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, subsec. (2)—Injury "attributable" to serious and wilful misconduct.—A miner while riding on the top of a loaded hutch in the mine, in breach of one of the rules in force in the mine, was killed by the fall of a stone from the roof of the tunnel in which the hutch was running.

Held that although the miner was guilty of serious and wilful misconduct his death was not "attributable" thereto in the sense of section 2, subsection 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that his widow was not barred from claiming compensation.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Mrs Margaret M'Lean Sneddon, widow of John Miller Sneddon, miner, Cambuslang, on her own behoof, and as tutrix of her pupil children, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from the Glasgow Coal Company, Limited, on account of the death of her husband.

The Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Thomson) having awarded compensation, the Glasgow Coal Company obtained a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted or proved:—"(1) That on 4th May 1904 the said deceased John Miller Sneddon was a miner in respondents' Kenmuirhill Colliery, and a workman in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. (2) That on said date, at the close of their days' work, he and three other workmen, including the assistant oversman, got on top of a rake of loaded hutches drawn by a pony, for the purpose of being conveyed to the pit bottom on their way home. (3) That they had no permission from the manager to do so, and that in doing so they contravened Special Rule No. 72, which is in force in said pit, and is duly enforced in terms of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. (4) That they were thereby guilty of serious and wilful misconduct. (5) That as the hutches were being drawn to the pit bottom a large stone, about 15 feet in length and weighing several tons, fell from the roof, with the result that he was instantaneously killed. (6) That the roof of the roadway is about 5 feet above the pavement, and the top of the coal in the hutches was about 3 feet 9 inches above the pavement, and that there was plenty of room (30 inches on one side and 24 inches on the other) between the hutches and the walls for men to walk."

"In these circumstances I found that although by lying on the hutches the deceased contravened Special Rule No. 72, and was thus guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, his death was not 'attributable' to such misconduct, and that the accident arose out of and in the course of deceased's employment, and I awarded" compensation accordingly.

The question of law was—"Was the death of the said John Miller Sneddon, occurring as it did under the circumstances above set forth, 'attributable' within the meaning of the Act to his serious and wilful misconduct in contravening said Special Rule, so as to bar the claimants from recovering compensation under said Act in respect of his death?"[1]

Argued for the appellants;—There was here a question of law—the question as to what was included in the word "attributable." Every question as to the meaning or definition of a word in an Act of Parliament was a question of law.[2] The accident was attributable to the workman's misconduct. His presence in the hutch was as much a part of the cause of the accident as was the falling of the stone, for if he had not been in the hutch the accident would not have taken place; and as his presence in the hutch was an act of serious and wilful misconduct, the accident was attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct.

Argued for the respondent;—The question here stated was a question of fact, not a question of law, and therefore the Court ought not to answer it. If it was a question of law, the answer that ought to be given was, that the accident was not attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of the deceased. There was no causal relation between his misconduct and the accident. On the facts stated the Sheriff-substitute had reached the right conclusion.[3]

LORD M'LAREN.—The case relates to an accident which occurred to a miner when he was on his way homewards in an underground passage of the mine. According to one of the rules, No. 72, which is in force in the pit, and which is found to be a lawful rule in terms of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, miners are prohibited from riding on the hutches employed for carrying coal along the underground passages. In this case the miner, whose death resulted from the fall of a stone, was along with other miners riding on one of the hutches indisputably in contravention of the rule. While the "rake" of hutches was on its way a large stone fell from the roof and instantaneously killed the miner, whose family are now suing for compensation. The Sheriff has found as matter of fact that riding on the hutch was serious misconduct on the part of the workman—not simple misconduct but serious misconduct. I take it that this means that he was exposing either himself or his master's property to danger, and that this was not a trivial contravention of a rule. Then he comes to the conclusion that "although by lying on the hutches the deceased contravened Special Rule No. 72, and was thus guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, his death was not 'attributable' to such misconduct, and that the accident arose out of and in the course of deceased's employment."

[1] The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, subsec. (2) (c), enacts:—"If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of that workman, any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall be disallowed."

I think the question whether the death of Sneddon was attributable within the meaning of the Act to his own misconduct is a proper question for the consideration of a Court of appeal. It has been held in both Divisions of this Court, and also in the English judicatories, that every question of the construction of a statute is a proper subject of appeal to the higher Court, and I think the question of law which the Sheriff here puts to us is neither more or less than this—What is included under the word "attributable"? I think that under that word there must be some causal relation between the misconduct of a workman and the injury which he suffers. It would not do to say that he was carrying a naked light on his person at the time when the stone came down, because although that would be a very serious act of misconduct in a mine where naked lights are not permitted, it has nothing to do with the accident or the consequent injury. It does not follow, however, that we are to interpret the word "attributable" as meaning that misconduct is the sole and only cause of the man's death or injury. It is enough that it is a material cause that in some way contributes to the unfortunate result. Therefore, I think that the question to be considered under the word "attributable" is very much the same as we have to consider in cases at common law where there is fault on the part of the employer or his servant, and the meaning is that the injury was either caused solely by the workman's own fault, or was contributed to materially by his act or fault.

Now, in this case the Sheriff has come to the conclusion that the fall of the roof was not attributable to the miner's contravention of the rule by mounting the waggon, and this is, or at least includes, a question of fact, because I can well believe that there might be cases where if a considerable number of men, for example, got into a train of empty hutches, and in the opinion of experts the total weight upon the train of hutches and the consequent vibration was the cause of dislodging loose stones in the roof at the moment when the train was passing, if that were proved or inferred from sound scientific and technical evidence, then the conclusion would be irresistible that the injury was attributable to the contravention of the rule. But then in the present case the Sheriff has found that the fall of stone and the consequent death of the workman were not attributable to his having mounted the waggon, and apparently his view is that the man might have met his death just the same if he had been walking behind the waggon instead of lying on the top of it. In the absence of scientific evidence to establish that additional weight put on this waggon was the cause of the stone coming down I am unable to differ from the Sheriff. I do not know that on the matter of fact it would have signified whether I differed or not, for we are only a Court of appeal as to matters of law, but so far as I understand the facts I think the Sheriff was perfectly justified in coming to the conclusion he did, and if he was of opinion that there was no connection between the falling of the stone that caused the accident and the men mounting on the hutch, I think he rightly decided that this was an accident in the course of the workman's employment, and for which his wife and children are entitled to compensation.

No. 86.

Glasgow Coal Co., Limited, v. Sneddon.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I entirely concur. As I read the case, the Sheriff has not found himself on the evidence able to affirm that the misconduct of the deceased was either the sole or a materially contributing cause of the accident. Upon the statement in the case I find myself in the same position; and therefore I am unable to hold that in the sense of the statute the deceased's death was "attributable" to his own misconduct.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and affirmed the award of the arbitrator.

The labourers in the employment of the stevedore were each appointed to work in connection with a particular hold of the vessel, either on board her or on the quay. A, who was employed on the quay to discharge cargo from the afterhold, and who did not require in the performance of his duty to go on board the vessel, on being informed that one of his fellow-workmen employed in the forehold was lying there in an unconscious condition owing to inhaling noxious gas, offered to attempt a rescue, and after a handkerchief had been tied round his mouth, was lowered into the forehold, where both he and the man he had attempted to rescue were suffocated by carbonic acid gas. A acted without instructions from his employer—the stevedore—who had gone for rescue appliances. The respondent having objected to the Auditor's report, the Court held (distinguishing M'Govern v. Cooper & Company, 4 F. 249), that "the expenses of the stated case" included the legitimate expenses in connection with the adjustment of the case, and allowed £2, 2s. of modified expenses under this head.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

MRS AGNES BROWN, widow, 5 Citadel, Leith, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from the London and Edinburgh Shipping Company, Leith, the matter was referred to the arbitration of one of the Sheriffs-substitute (Guy) at Edinburgh, who awarded compensation, and at the request of the London and Edinburgh Shipping Company stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted or proved:—"On 6th May 1904, the steamship 'Fingal,' owned by the appellants, was moored at the quay adjoining the West Pier, Leith. On that date her cargo was being discharged by workmen in the employment of Peter M'Leod, stevedore, Leith, who was under contract with the appellants to discharge the cargo at an overhead rate per ton. The discharge was being carried out at three holds of the vessel,—namely, the forehold, mainhold, and afterhold,—by means of steam cranes on board the vessel. Certain of Peter M'Leod's employees were engaged on board the vessel, and certain of them on the quay, each man being appointed to work in or in connection with one of said holds. Peter Brown, who resided at 5 Citadel, Leith, was one of Peter M'Leod's employees engaged to work on the quay in connection with the discharge of the cargo from the afterhold. His duty was to remove the cargo, on its being put upon the quay, to the place appointed for it, and he did not require in the performance of such duty to go on board the vessel. In returning from the place where he had put part of the cargo, and while passing the forehold of the vessel, he was informed by another employee of Peter M'Leod, who was working on board the vessel in connection with the forehold, that a man was lying unconscious in the forehold. This man was David Preston, also in the employment of Peter M'Leod, and engaged in the work of discharging the forehold. Peter Brown, on receiving this information, did not return to his work on the quay at the afterhold, but immediately went on board the vessel by the forehold gangway, offered to descend into the forehold, and was lowered by means of the crane there situated, for the purpose of rescuing Preston. Prior to his being so lowered, a handkerchief was tied over his mouth to prevent, if possible, his inhaling any noxious gas. In so acting, Brown did not wait to receive instructions from his employer, who was absent from the forehatch at the time he was lowered into the hold, though his said employer had learned of Preston's being unconscious, and had himself gone in search of rescue appliances. The crane was used for lowering the said Peter Brown without the knowledge of the said Peter M'Leod. On being lowered into the hold, Brown also became unconscious, and before the two men could be rescued they died. Their death was occasioned by their inhaling carbonic acid gas that had been generated in the said forehold from a cargo of artificial manure."

The Sheriff-substitute found "that Peter Brown's employment was on, in, or about a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; that the appellants were the undertakers within the meaning of said Act; and that said accident arose out of and in the course of the said Peter Brown's employment."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Whether the deceased's employment was on, in, or about a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897? and (2) Whether on the facts proved the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment?"

Argued for the appellants;—The accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased.[1] His employment was confined to the quay; it was not part of his duty to go on board the ship. He simply volunteered to rescue the other man, just as any bystander might have done. The fact that he was in the same employment as the man whom he tried to rescue made no difference. It might have been otherwise had the two men been working on the same job, and one of them on the impulse of the moment had attempted to rescue the other; but the claimant's son was not working on the same job as the other man, for the claimant's son belonged to a quay gang and the other man to a gang on board the ship, and the claimant's son deliberately undertook and set about the work of rescue. It was said that he acted in the interest of his master in attempting this rescue. It was not stated as a fact that he acted in the interest of his master; on the other hand it was stated that he acted without his master's instructions, and that his master had himself gone for rescue appliances. In the case of Rees v. Thomas[2] the workman when engaged in the ordinary course of his employment was injured by doing something which was not within his strict duty but was in his master's interest, on the occurrence of a sudden emergency. There were here too different factories—the ship and the quay; the deceased was employed on the quay; the accident certainly did not occur "on or in" the quay, and it was difficult to see how it could be said to have occurred about the "quay" when it, in fact, took place in another "factory," namely the ship.

Argued for the respondent;—The deceased met his death through an accident which arose out of and in the course of his employment. Both he and the man whom he tried to rescue were working in the same employment and in the same factory. He acted in his master's interest on the occurrence of a sudden emergency. There might be a duty, although not a legal duty capable of being enforced by action, of which the Court would take cognisance in considering claims under the Act or for damages at common law.[3] To exclude a claim like the present a case of serious and wilful misconduct must be established.[4]

At advising, on 31st January 1905,— No. 87.

Feb. 16, 1905. London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears to me that there can be no doubt that the deceased workman was, at the time when working immediately before the accident, employed on, in, or about a factory, the work which was being done having been the unloading of a ship and the placing of her cargo upon the quay alongside. Therefore the only real question in the case is whether it can be held that he was in the course of his employment at the time when the accident to him occurred which caused his death. The circumstances are, that while at the side of the vessel he was suddenly informed that a fellow-workman was unconscious in the forehold, that he at once tied a handkerchief over his mouth, and got himself lowered to try to rescue the other man, and was himself suffocated.

Is he to be held, in these circumstances, to have acted in his employment? I think it must be fairly held that that question may be answered as it was answered in the Court below. I cannot doubt that, in a sudden emergency where there is danger, a workman does not go out of his employment if he endeavours to prevent the danger from taking effect. For example, if, in a yard where a man is working, a horse suddenly runs off, and there is danger to others, I would hold that, if the man did his best to stop the horse, and met with an injury, he suffered that injury in the course of his employment. It would be a right thing to do, in the interest of the safety of those in the yard, and, therefore, in the interest of his master. The same would apply to the endeavour to sprag a runaway waggon, which might cause loss of life. No doubt this case is somewhat unusual, and the endeavour was made to liken it to the case of persons arriving on the scene of a disaster, such as a coal pit explosion, and deliberately volunteering to join a rescue party, and who, therefore, could be held not to be acting as employees, but solely as individuals. I can conceive such a case, where it would be very difficult to make the Act apply; but, in my view, any such case is distinguishable from the present one. Here the deceased was at the work that was going on. Had one of the men who was with him, engaged in work on the quay, come suddenly into danger, and he had instantly endeavoured to save him, I could have no hesitation in saying that his doing so was an act in the course of his employment. I do not feel that his case falls into a different category because the man he tried to save was engaged at a different department of the same work in the factory. My opinion is that there is no sufficient ground disclosed in the statement of facts to require that we should hold that the Sheriff pronounced a wrong decision in law in finding liability under the Act, and that the questions in the case should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I should have been glad to have seen my way to concur in the Sheriff's judgment, for undoubtedly the unfortunate deceased sacrificed his life in performing a most meritorious action. But the question is whether his relatives are entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and I have come to the conclusion that, putting on the provisions of that Act the most liberal interpretation possible, the case with which we have to deal is not a case to which they apply.

London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown.

It is admitted—at least it is clear—that there are three conditions which must be satisfied before the Act can apply: (1) the occurrence which has caused the death or injury must have been in the sense of the Act an "accident"; (2) the accident must have arisen out of the workman's employment—that is to say, his employment with the defending employer; and (3) it must also have been an accident arising in the course of that employment. All these things, I apprehend, must be affirmed before the Act can apply.

Now, I do not find it necessary to determine whether in the present case the two latter conditions are satisfied. I confess I have some doubt whether the occurrence happened in the course of the deceased's employment. And I also doubt whether it can be said to have arisen out of his employment—I mean out of his employment at the particular time and place. I rather think that upon the facts stated it is difficult to affirm that what happened would not equally have happened although, the deceased being at the time where he was, had been there in some other employment, or in no employment at all.

But assuming both of these points in the respondent's favour, the question (I think the initial question) still remains—viz., whether the deceased lost his life by what can properly be called "accident." The statute, according to its title, applies only to "accidental injuries"; and compensation is allowed not in respect of all injuries arising out of or in the course of the workman's employment, but only in respect of personal injury by accident. That being so, and the statute containing no definition of the term "accident," that term must, I apprehend, be taken in its ordinary and usual sense—the sense in which it is employed in common speech. What has to be affirmed therefore is that, in the ordinary sense of the expression, the death of the deceased was a death by accident.

Now, it is, of course, not enough that the deceased met his death in seeking to redress the results of an accident. The unfortunate man whom he sought to rescue may have been a victim of accident; that does not appear, but it probably was so. But the presence, accidental or otherwise, of poisonous fumes in the hold of this vessel was of course in no proper sense the cause of the deceased's death. The cause of his death was his descending into the hold, and coming in contact with those fumes. Accordingly the question, I apprehend, is whether he came in contact with the fumes by accident in the sense of the statute.

Now, when the question is so stated, it seems to me to be difficult to return an affirmative answer. For how did the deceased come into contact with the poisonous fumes by which he perished? It is, I am afraid, clear that he did not do so acting instinctively upon some sudden and instinctive impulse —some impulse so sudden and instinctive as to be perhaps in itself an accident. Nor, again, was what occurred the result of something casual and adventitious—such, for example, as tripping or stumbling or losing his hold, and so falling into the hold. On the contrary, what happened was this: He (the deceased) voluntarily and deliberately, knowing and having in view that he was going out to encounter a serious and perhaps deadly danger, left the place of his work, boarded the ship, offered to descend into the hold, had himself lowered into it by the crane, and so purposely and deliberately put himself into contact with the poisonous fumes, by the direct action of which he died.

I confess I do not see how such an occurrence can be an accident under the statute, unless, indeed, it is to be held that in the sense of the statute the term "accident" includes everything that is not the result of gross and wilful misconduct on the part of the workman. That was not suggested in argument, and for myself I am not prepared to put so extreme a construction upon the statute. It is not necessary, and I do not propose to attempt any formal definition of the term accident, a term which the statute does not define, but leaves, as I have said, to be interpreted according to its use in common speech. But I think, speaking generally, we know fairly well the kind of occurrence which the expression denotes; and all I can say is, that it does not seem to me to denote or cover such occurrences as we have here to consider. It appears, I confess, to me that to describe the death of this brave man as a death by accident would be a misnomer, as much a misnomer as if the expression were applied, say to the death of the leader of a forlorn hope; or, of a soldier who, taking his life in his hand, crosses a zone of fire to rescue a wounded comrade; or, of a servant who, to save, say his master, makes his way through smoke and flame into a burning house; or, of a miner who forms one of a rescue party, who (volunteers being called for) descends into a fiery mine, and succumbs to the peril which he has bravely faced. Such enterprises may be heroic, and deserve, and, I hope, generally receive recognition. But, for myself, I doubt whether persons who engage in such enterprises would be flattered by the suggestion that (if employees in the position of this deceased) the appropriate recognition of their heroism was compensation by their employer as for an accident—compensation as for an accident arising out of or in the course of their employment.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that, while the first question in the case may be answered in the affirmative, the second question falls to be answered in the negative; and, in any case, that the appeal should be sustained, and the defender assoilzied.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the two questions of law therein stated in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly: Therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator and decern: Find the respondent entitled to the expenses of the stated case, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report."

The respondent's account of expenses, as lodged with the Auditor, consisted, inter alia, of charges amounting in all to £7, 7s. 2d. incurred in connection with the adjustment of the case stated for appeal. The sum of £7, 7s. 2d. included charges for considering the minute for the case, attendance obtaining case at Sheriff-clerk's office, perusing case, correspondence and meetings with appellant's agents, fee (£2, 7s.) to counsel and his clerk for revising stated case, charges for instructing counsel to revise the stated case, for attendance on counsel in connection with the revising and adjustment of the stated case, &c.

The Auditor disallowed all the charges incurred in connection with the adjustment of the stated case, and allowed a sum of £27, 14s. 6d. in all, including a fee of £1 "for taking instructions to defend the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor."

No. 87.

London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown.

The respondent objected to the Auditor's report in so far as it disallowed the charges in connection with the adjustment of the stated case.

Argued for the respondent;—The charges disallowed were for work properly done in connection with the preparation of the case for appeal,[1] and as such they fell under the allowance in the interlocutor of 31st January of "the expenses of the stated case." M'Govern v. Cooper & Company[2] was distinguishable, for there the award was of the "expenses of the appeal," which covered only expenses incurred after the case had come into the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellants;—The case was ruled by M'Govern.[2] In any view, the charges in question, in so far as they were legitimate charges against the appellants, were included in the £1 allowed by the Auditor as the fee for taking instructions to defend the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that the present case is governed by M'Govern v. Cooper & Co.[2] The interlocutors in the two cases are different. In the case of M'Govern the respondents were found entitled to "the expenses of the appeal"; in the present case the respondent is founded entitled to "the expenses of the stated case." The two expressions are different, and I do not regard the cases as being in pari casu. Here, where the respondent has been allowed the expenses of the stated case, I consider that the Auditor has erred in holding that all the expenses connected with the preparation of the case prior to its actual presentation to the Court are excluded. I am of opinion that the fair and reasonable expenses of preparing the case are included in the interlocutor, and should have been allowed.

Many, however, of the items set forth in the respondent's account cannot be included in that category, and are not charges which a successful party is entitled to call upon the unsuccessful party to bear. Here we have, without going into the matter in detail, charges for a list of preliminary letters connected with the adjustment of the case, a charge for instructing counsel to revise the case, a fee to counsel and clerk for revising the case, a charge for attendance on counsel in connection with the revision and adjustment, and so on. One of the objects of the Act is to avoid the multiplication of expenses in so far as that is possible, and the class of expenses I have indicated above is one which, if incurred at all, must be borne by the party who incurs it. As regards especially the fees and charges connected with the employment of counsel, I am at a loss to see what counsel can adjust. The facts of the case can only be adjusted by those who were present at the arbitration, and who knew what took place. The Act of Sederunt which provides for the method of adjusting the stated case imposes the duty of its preparation upon the Sheriff-clerk, who must submit it in draft to the parties and their agents, and if they cannot agree as to its terms, the Sheriff himself adjusts it. As regards the questions of law, although in practice they may be arranged by the parties, they are really questions propounded by the Sheriff, and are entirely outwith the province of counsel. I am quite clear that all charges connected with the employment of counsel in connection with the preparation of the case are illegitimate. As I have already indicated, I think the same remark applies to certain other charges. The total charges connected with the preparation of the case apparently come to approximately the sum of £7. I think it would be undesirable to remit them to the Auditor for taxation, as that would involve still further cost, and accordingly I propose that we should modify them at two guineas.

LORD ADAM.—I understand that the interlocutor in this case finds the pursuer entitled to "the expenses of the stated case." I also understand that the Auditor has not considered the particular items in question separately, but has struck out all the charges connected with the preparation of the stated case. I agree with your Lordship that there are certain expenses incurred in preparing the stated case which are necessary and legitimate, such as the cost of the application to the Sheriff to state a case, and the adjustment of the draft. I also agree that, so far as these necessary expenses are concerned, the successful party is entitled, under such an award as the present, to recover them from his opponent. I do not think that this case is ruled by M'Govern v. Cooper & Co.[1] In that case the respondent was found entitled to the expenses, not of "the stated case," but of "the appeal," and this included only the expenses of the proceedings after the action was brought into the Court of Session, and not expenses incurred prior to that date. Then it is said that the charges in question are covered by the fee which has been allowed for taking instructions, and which is included in the account of expenses in the Court of Session. I do not think that this is meant to cover the expenses of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court connected with the preparation of the case. As regards the particular items in this account, they have not been, as I have said, separately considered by the Auditor, and I think that the amount charged is too large. I agree that in this case the amount should be modified to two guineas.

LORD YOUNG and LORD KINCAIRNEY were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the Auditor's report on the respondent's account of expenses and note of objections thereto for the respondent, sustain the objections by adding the sum of £2, 2s. to the amount of £27, 14s. 6d. allowed by the Auditor: Quoad ultra approve of the Auditor's report, and decern against the appellants for payment to the respondent of the sum of £29, 16s. 6d. of expenses: Further, find the respondent entitled to the expenses of the discussion, which modify at the sum of £2, 2s., for which also decern."

WILLIAM HONOUR AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Real Raisers (Reclaimers).—Campbell, K.C.—Findlay.
MRS JESSIE MUIRHEAD AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Crabb Watt, K.C.—A. M. Anderson.

Heritable and Moveable—Public-House—Goodwill—Terce—Jus relictæ.—The question whether the goodwill of a public-house is heritable or moveable depends on the circumstances of each case.

Circumstances in which held (following Graham's Trustees v. Graham, July 20, 1904, 6 F. 1015), in a question as to a widow's legal rights, that the value of the goodwill of two public-houses, one of which was occupied by the deceased as tenant, while the other belonged to him as proprietor, was heritable estate.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

JAMES MUIRHEAD, wine and spirit-merchant, Glasgow, died upon 6th March 1900. At the time of his death Mr Muirhead carried on a wine and spirit business in two shops in Glasgow, the one at Keppochhill Road as tenant, the other at Springburn Road in premises of which he was proprietor. Mr Muirhead's testamentary trustees carried on the Keppochhill Road business till February 1901, when they sold the goodwill, fittings, and utensils to Mr William Mackintosh, Mr Muirhead's manager, for £4350, on condition that the purchaser should be accepted as tenant by the landlord.

The trustees carried on the Springburn Road business till March 1902, when they sold "the goodwill, fittings, and utensils of the business for £11,600 on condition that the purchaser should receive a licence at the next April Licensing Court, and should receive a lease for ten years at a rent of £190.

The truster's widow having claimed her legal rights, the trustees brought an action of multiplepoinding in which they called the widow and children of the deceased as defenders for the purpose of determining whether the sums received for the two businesses which formed the fund in medio were heritable or moveable.

The trustees claimed to be ranked and preferred as trustees to the whole fund in medio.

The widow claimed to be ranked and preferred to her jus relictæ, being one-third of the fund in medio, or alternatively, in the event of the fund in medio being held to be partly heritable and partly moveable to jus relictæ out of the moveable portion, and terce out of the price of the Springburn Road business so far as it might be held to be heritable on the footing that the price was to be treated as a grassum and one-tenth thereof added to the rent of each year.

The proof, which was allowed and led, disclosed the following facts:—

(1) The wine and spirit business carried on at 439-441 Keppochhill Road, Glasgow.—The licence certificate was an ordinary public-house licence, and was held by the deceased in his own name. The deceased was tenant of these premises under a lease whereby the premises were let to the deceased and his heirs, executors, and disponees, but excluding subtenants and assignees, legal and voluntary, without the consent of the proprietor, for seven years from Whitsunday 1896, at the yearly rent of £95. The business was carried on by the trustees till February 1901, when it was sold along with the fittings and utensils for £4350, on condition that the certificate would be transferred to the purchaser, and that he would be accepted by the landlord as tenant. The transfer was duly granted to the purchaser, who was accepted as tenant, and paid the price. No stipulation was made for a continuance of the deceased's name in the business, and the purchaser carried it on in his own name. The value of the fittings and utensils, as given up in the inventory of the deceased's estate, was £23, 5s. 1d.

(2) The wine and spirit business at 380-382 Springburn Road, Glasgow.—The licence certificate for these premises was an ordinary public-house licence, and was held by the deceased in his own name. The shop in which the business was carried on belonged to the deceased. The business was carried on by the trustees for fully two years after the testator's death, when it was sold, along with the fittings and utensils, in March 1902, for £11,600, on condition that a ten years' lease would be given to the purchaser, at a rent of £190 per annum, and that the licence certificate would be transferred to him. The transfer was duly granted, the price paid, and the lease entered into. No stipulation was made for a continuance of the deceased's name in the business, and the purchaser carried it on in his own name. The shop in which the business was carried on remained the property of the trustees. The value of the fittings and utensils, as given up in the inventory of the deceased's estate, was £49, 8s. 6d.

On 19th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the proof and productions and heard counsel for the parties, finds (1) that the value of the goodwill, utensils, fittings, &c., of the business in Keppochhill Road, Glasgow, which belonged to the deceased James Muirhead, was, at the date of his death, £4000, and that for the purpose of fixing the widow's legal rights it falls to be regarded as wholly moveable in its character; (2) that the sum of £11,600 obtained by the pursuers in March 1902, for the goodwill, utensils, fittings, &c., of the business in Springburn Road falls to be regarded for said purpose as moveable in its character to the extent of £5800, and as heritable to the extent of the like sum of £5800; (3) that for the purpose of fixing the widow's jus relictæ, the value of the goodwill of the Springburn Road business, at the date of the death of the said James Muirhead, is to be taken at £10,600, of which the sum of £5300 is to be taken as representing moveable estate; (4) that the said sum of £5800, part of the price of the Springburn Road business, effeiring to the heritable estate, is of the nature of a grassum paid by the tenant to whom the said premises have been let, and is subject to the widow's claim for terce; (5) that the defender and claimant, Mrs Muirhead, is entitled to payment, in name of jus relictæ, of one-third of the said sums of £4000 and £5300 respectively, effeiring to the deceased's moveable estate, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from 6th March 1900, until payment; and (6) that the said sum of £5800, being the part of the value of the goodwill of the Springburn Road business effeiring to the deceased's heritable estate, falls to be divided into ten equal parts, corresponding to the years of the lease granted by the pursuers to the purchaser of the Springburn Road business, and that accordingly, for the purpose of fixing Mrs Muirhead's terce, the rent for each year of said lease falls to be increased from £190, being the amount stipulated in the said lease, to £770: And in respect of these findings ranks and prefers the said defender, Mrs Jessie Ballantyne or Muirhead, on the fund in medio (1) to the extent of the sum of

JAMES MUIRHEAD, wine and spirit-merchant, Glasgow, died upon 6th March 1900. At the time of his death Mr Muirhead carried on a wine and spirit business in two shops in Glasgow, the one at Keppochhill Road as tenant, the other at Springburn Road in premises of which he was proprietor. Mr Muirhead's testamentary trustees carried on the Keppochhill Road business till February 1901, when they sold the goodwill, fittings, and utensils to Mr William Mackintosh, Mr Muirhead's manager, for £4350, on condition that the purchaser should be accepted as tenant by the landlord.

The trustees carried on the Springburn Road business till March 1902, when they sold "the goodwill, fittings, and utensils of the business for £11,600 on condition that the purchaser should receive a licence at the next April Licensing Court, and should receive a lease for ten years at a rent of £190.

The truster's widow having claimed her legal rights, the trustees brought an action of multiplepoinding in which they called the widow and children of the deceased as defenders for the purpose of determining whether the sums received for the two businesses which formed the fund in medio were heritable or moveable.

The trustees claimed to be ranked and preferred as trustees to the whole fund in medio.

The widow claimed to be ranked and preferred to her jus relictæ, being one-third of the fund in medio, or alternatively, in the event of the fund in medio being held to be partly heritable and partly moveable to jus relictæ out of the moveable portion, and terce out of the price of the Springburn Road business so far as it might be held to be heritable on the footing that the price was to be treated as a grassum and one-tenth thereof added to the rent of each year.

The proof, which was allowed and led, disclosed the following facts:—

(1) The wine and spirit business carried on at 439-441 Keppochhill Road, Glasgow.—The licence certificate was an ordinary public-house licence, and was held by the deceased in his own name. The deceased was tenant of these premises under a lease whereby the premises were let to the deceased and his heirs, executors, and disponees, but excluding subtenants and assignees, legal and voluntary, without the consent of the proprietor, for seven years from Whitsunday 1896, at the yearly rent of £95. The business was carried on by the trustees till February 1901, when it was sold along with the fittings and utensils for £4350, on condition that the certificate would be transferred to the purchaser, and that he would be accepted by the landlord as tenant. The transfer was duly granted to the purchaser, who was accepted as tenant, and paid the price. No stipulation was made for a continuance of the deceased's name in the business, and the purchaser carried it on in his own name. The value of the fittings and utensils, as given up in the inventory of the deceased's estate, was £23, 5s. 1d.

(2) The wine and spirit business at 380-382 Springburn Road, Glasgow.—The licence certificate for these premises was an ordinary public-house licence, and was held by the deceased in his own name. The shop in which the business was carried on belonged to the deceased. The business was carried on by the trustees for fully two years after the testator's death, when it was sold, along with the fittings and utensils, in March 1902, for £11,600, on condition that a ten years' lease would be given to the purchaser, at a rent of £190 per annum, and that the licence certificate would be transferred to him. The transfer was duly granted, the price paid, and the lease entered into. No stipulation was made for a continuance of the deceased's name in the business, and the purchaser carried it on in his own name. * "OPINION.—In this multiplepoinding the competing claimants are, on the one hand, the widow, and, on the other hand, the trustees of the late Mr Muirhead, who died in March 1901, having for a number of years carried on a successful business in two public-houses in Glasgow. One of these public-houses was his own property. The other was held under a lease, which at his death had about two years to run, and which excluded assignees and subtenants. The widow having elected to claim her legal rights, questions have arisen as to how far she is entitled to participate in two sums—one of £11,600, and the other of £4350—obtained by the trustees for the goodwills of the two licensed businesses. These sums form the fund in medio. The widow claims that they both represented elements of goodwill which were entirely personal. The trustees, on the other hand, claim that in each case the price obtained represented elements which were wholly heritable. They say in the one case that the £11,600, whatever it was called, was really a grassum paid over and above his rent by the tenant to whom they (the trustees) let, on a ten years' lease, the shop of which the deceased was owner. They say similarly in the other case that the £4350 was simply a large premium paid by the purchaser for the reversion, such as it was, of the lease which the deceased held of the public-house of which he was tenant.

"A proof has been led, and what I have now to consider is what conclusions fall to be drawn from it. I say so, because it is important to keep in mind that we are here in a class of questions where we have to deal with facts, and not with legal formulas, or even legal presumptions. Certain things, of course, require to be postulated. For example, nobody, I suppose, disputes that in connection with the business of a public-house, as of any other business, there is, or may be, something which is called goodwill,—something which is of marketable value and is personal property. Nor is it, I suppose, doubtful that this personal goodwill may survive the owner's death, may pass to his executors, may enter his inventory, may be the subject of taxation, and may generally, and for all purposes, form part of his moveable succession. All that is probably quite clear. But how far in any particular case such goodwill exists: how far it survives its owner and transmits as a marketable subject to his executors: how, if it has been sold in cumulo with other assets having a heritable character, the necessary apportionment of the cumulo price is to be made:—all these are questions which depend necessarily upon the facts of the particular case; and which Muirhead's Trustees v. Muirhead.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The case was ruled by the decision in Graham v. Graham's Trustees[1] where the facts were precisely similar. No doubt there might be a personal element in the goodwill of a public-house,[2] but, according to the test laid down by Lord Rutherfurd Clark in Philp's Executor v. Philp's Executor,[3] that element was wanting here. Acquiescence in the transfer of the certificate was of no value in determining the question,[4] and there was here no obligation not to compete as in Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk.[5] The practice of dividing the sum received for goodwill into one-half heritable and one-half moveable had only been adopted where there was an absence of definite evidence as to the nature of the goodwill. Here the evidence that the goodwill was heritable was clear and distinct. The English cases relied on by the other side dealt with an entirely different class of subject, and were not in point.

are questions not of law, or of legal presumption, but of fact and of evidence.

"Keeping this in view, my conclusions upon the proof are shortly these:—

"In the first place, I think it is clear that both goodwills were assets of the deceased at the time of his death. I see no reason to doubt that if he had during the last years of his life desired to do so, he might have obtained for them sums substantially the same as those subsequently obtained by his trustees. Nor do I see any reason to think (subject to what I shall say presently as to certain increases in the drawings after his death), that the sums in question were obtained by the trustees in respect of anything contributed by them (the trustees) or by the beneficiaries individually. The trustees held and sold simply as representatives of the deceased. The case of Philp, 21 R. 482, and cases of that kind, have, I think, obviously no application here.

"(2) Further, I think it clear that (subject to the same qualification) the whole sum received for the goodwill of the smaller business—the Keppochhill business—must be held as moveable estate. In this case there was—so far as I see—no heritable element which entered into the price. The premises did not belong to the deceased, he had merely a lease which was nearly run out. It was moreover, as I have said, a lease which was not assignable. Nor was it in fact assigned. Anything heritable—anything attaching to the premises—the purchaser got, not from the trustees, but from the landlord, with whom he directly transacted.

"(3) I am next of opinion that (subject to the same qualification) the £11,600 paid for the goodwill of the larger business—the Springburn business—must be apportioned as between the heritable and moveable succession. It is, I think, proved, that to a large extent, possibly the larger extent, the sum in question represented what is called heritable goodwill—goodwill inseparably attached to the premises, and the price of which was really and in substance a grassum paid by the tenant. But, on the other hand, it is, I think, also proved that to a large extent the price represented those elements of goodwill which I have called personal—elements which did not attach to the premises, which were largely associated with the licence, and which I sometime ago endeavoured to analyse in the case of Hughes, 19 R. 840. How

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right. The goodwill of the Keppochhill business was wholly moveable. All that Graham's Trustees[1] laid down was that the decision as between heritable and moveable must depend upon the circumstances of each case. The present case was ruled by the decision in Murray's Trustees v. M'Intyre.[2] The case of Philp's Executor v. Philp's Executor[3] raised a very special question as to the ownership of the business, and had been distinguished in Murray's Trustees.[2] The practice of the Valuation Court was to divide the price received for goodwill equally between heritable and moveable.[4] The English cases supported this view.[5]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This multiplepoinding has been brought by the trustees of James Muirhead, who died on 6th March 1900. He had carried on busi-in such circumstances the apportionment is to be made is always a matter of difficulty. It is a question which comes up frequently in the Valuation Courts; and there it has been found necessary to sanction, or at least accept, a certain rough and ready method commonly adopted in practice, and found generally to be not unfair—viz., to divide the total price in equal portions between the two kinds of goodwill. I do not think that in view of the figures disclosed by the other transaction—the Keppochhill transaction—that apportionment is unfair here. In saying so, I have quite in view that the premises here are superior to, and in a better locality than, the Keppochhill premises. But, on the other hand, I have also to keep in view that there was here in addition to the payment of goodwill a very substantial increase of rent. On the whole, therefore, I propose to apportion the goodwill on the principle I have mentioned.

"(4) I have said, however, that there is a certain qualification applicable to both cases. It appears that the mode in which the goodwill was here estimated (a mode said to be the usual mode) is to take a certain average of the weekly drawings. That being so, it has to be considered what effect is to be given to a certain increase in the weekly drawings which occurred between the deceased's death and the sale, and while the trustees were themselves carrying on both businesses. The increase was not in either case very great. It was £10 a week in the one case, and £3 in the other; and partly, at all events, it must have been merely a natural increment due in no way to the management of the trustees or their personal merits. But in a question of legitim or jus relictæ it is no doubt true that the moveable estate must be estimated as at the date of the death—the rule, I think, being that the children or widow receive interest from the date of the death, and not (at least in the general case) anything else. That being so, I think I must for the present purpose make some deduction from the total price in each case. It is, of course, only possible to do so roughly; but it appears to me that, all things considered, £1000 may be fairly deducted in the one case, and £350 in the other. The net result, therefore, is that the widow in name of jus relictæ gets in respect of personal goodwill, including fittings, ness as a wine and spirit-merchant at two shops in Glasgow, the one at Keppochhill Road, and the other at Springburn Road. He was tenant of the premises at Keppochhill Road under a lease for seven years from Whitsunday 1896, and was proprietor of the premises at Springburn Road. His trustees continued his business at Keppochhill Road until February 1901, when they sold "the goodwill, fittings, and utensils" to Mr William Mackintosh, Mr Muirhead's manager, for £4350, on the condition that the purchaser was accepted by the landlord as tenant. The trustees carried on the business at Springburn Road until March 1902, when they sold the "goodwill, fittings, and utensils" of the business for £11,600 on the condition that the purchaser should receive the licence at the next April Licensing Court; that he should receive a lease of the premises for ten years after Whitsunday 1902 at a rent of £190; and that the purchaser would apply for a transfer of the licence certificate at the April Licensing Court.

In both cases the fittings were included in the sales, but no reference is made to them on record, nor were they referred to at the debate, which proceeded on the footing that the sums paid were paid for the goodwills of the respective businesses.

The question, therefore, in this case is whether the sums paid for the goodwill of these two businesses are to be treated as wholly heritable or as wholly moveable, or as partly heritable and partly moveable, and, if the latter, in what proportions?

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. I agree with the definition or description of goodwill given by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Trego v. Hunt.[1] "What goodwill means," (he says) "must depend on the character and nature of the business to which it is attached. Generally speaking, it means much more than what Lord Eldon took it to mean in the particular case actually before him in Cruttwell v. Lye,[2] where he says,—'The goodwill

&c., from the price of the Springburn business one-third of one-half of £10,600—that is to say £1766, 13s. 4d.; and from the price of the Keppochhill business one-third of £4000—that is to say, £1333, 6s. 8d.

"(5) The widow, however, in addition to her jus relictæ claims terce in respect of one half of the £11,600 which was received for the Springburn business; that half, if I am right, being really a grassum paid by the tenant of the shop in addition to the rent expressed in his lease. Now, it appears to me that this claim is well founded. The widow cannot, I apprehend, repudiate the lease or rather the transaction of which the lease was a part. She had not served to her terce or otherwise interpelled the trustees when the lease was granted. In any case, she does not propose to repudiate. But having looked into the authorities, I see no reason why she should not as against the trustees have right to one-third of the additional rent which the grassum represents. In other words, the £5800, which was really a grassum, must be distributed over the ten years of the lease—the additional rent in which the widow is entitled to participate being thus £580.

"The net result is that the widow will receive out of the two funds in medio as jus relictæ the sum of £3100, with interest from the date of the testator's death. She will also receive out of the proceeds of the fund in medio, in name of terce, £193, 6s. 8d. per annum during the currency of the lease."

which has been the subject of sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place.' Often it happens that the goodwill is the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit. It is the whole advantage, whatever it may be, of the reputation and connection of the firm, which may have been built up by years of honest work or gained by lavish expenditure of money."

It appears to me that the goodwill of a business carried on in licensed premises is of a somewhat peculiar character. It is true that in Scotland it is the person who carries on the business who is licensed, and not the premises, but he is licensed to carry on the business only in particular premises, and hence it is that the licence attaches to the premises and enhances their value, and that such premises are generally known and spoken of as licensed premises.

If there were free trade in the sale of liquors, if a person could open a shop anywhere for their sale, the goodwill of an existing business in the centre of a populous city like Glasgow would be of little or no value. It is the known fact of the objections which the licensing authorities entertain to increasing the number of public-houses which gives to existing public-houses their enhanced value. It is the person who has a right to the possession of the licensed premises, whether as landlord or tenant, at the date of the sale, who has a valuable asset to sell.

I further think that the goodwill in this case does not fall within the class of cases pictured by Lord Macnaghten in which the goodwill consists in the advantage of the reputation and connection of a firm built up by years of honest work or lavish expenditure of money. In such a case the right to use the name, whether of a firm or individual, is a valuable asset, and in the sale of such a business is a matter of transaction or arrangement. But I think there is little of that element in this case. The right to use the name of the seller was not purchased, and both purchasers immediately proceeded to carry on the respective businesses they had acquired in their own names.

Although, as I have said, the nature of goodwill, whether heritable or moveable, depends on the circumstances of each case, yet the facts of this case and the facts of the case in Graham's Trustees[1] are so similar that I think this case is ruled by the principles affirmed by this Division of the Court in that case.

Take the case of the Keppochhill Road shop in this case, and the Oxford Street shop in Graham's case.[1]

In both cases the sale of the goodwill is of licensed premises in Glasgow.

In both cases the deceased Mr Muirhead and Mr Graham were tenants of the premises, in which they carried on their businesses, in this case under a lease which had rather more than three years to run, and in Graham's case[1] under a lease which had rather more than a year. In both cases the trustees carried on the business for a time. In this case the sale took place when the lease had rather more than two years to run. In Graham's case,[1] when it had about six weeks. In this case the sale was conditional on the purchaser being accepted by the landlord as tenant. In Graham's case[1] the purchaser had already arranged with the landlord for a new lease.

Feb. 17. 1905. Muirhead's Trustees v. Muirhead.

These being the essential facts bearing on this question of goodwill, I cannot distinguish between the two cases, and as we held in Graham's case[1] that the goodwill was heritable, so I think we must hold in this case that it also is heritable.

I am also of opinion that the goodwill of the business carried on at Springburn Road is wholly heritable. It was not disputed that the value of that goodwill was to be taken as £10,600.

These premises belonged to Mr Muirhead himself, and he carried on the business there. After his death his trustees carried on the business for about two years. In March 1902 they sold it to a Mr Murray for £11,600, on condition that a lease for ten years should be given to him at a rent of £190 per annum from Whitsunday 1902, and that he should obtain a transference of the licence. All this was duly carried through. Mr Murray paid the £11,600 and obtained the lease and the transfer of the licence. £1000 has been deducted from the £11,600 by the Lord Ordinary as representing the increased earnings of the shop during the trustees' management, and this, as I have said, is acquiesced in.

The Lord Ordinary has held that the sum of £10,600 representing the goodwill of the business is half heritable and half moveable, but if I am right in what I have already said, that the principles laid down in Graham's case[1] apply to this case, it is clearly wholly heritable.

It will be observed from the purchaser Mr Murray's evidence that he attached no value to the name in which the business had been carried on.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the heritable goodwill, effeiring to the Springburn Road premises, whatever its amount, is to be treated as a grassum and one-tenth of it added to the rent of each year. If this be so, then, taking the amount of the goodwill at £10,600, the claimant will be entitled to an additional annual payment of £160 to that allowed her by the Lord Ordinary, or in all to an annual payment of £353, 6s. 8d.

I am of opinion, accordingly, that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it finds the goodwill of the Keppochhill Road business to be moveable, and in so far as it finds one-half of the goodwill of the Springburn Road business to be moveable and one-half heritable, and to find that the whole of it is heritable, and is to be divided into ten equal parts, and to be disposed of exactly as he has directed with regard to the one-half of it which he held to be heritable.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I only desire to add that I do not dissent from the view of the Lord Ordinary that there is no rule of our law which makes it impossible for the executors or heirs in mobilibus of a deceased publican to shew that they have an interest in the goodwill of his business. But whether any of the elements which go to make a saleable goodwill are heritable or moveable is a question of fact which must be determined according to the circumstances of the particular case, and treating the question here raised as a question of fact, I agree with your Lordship, for the reasons you have given, that the goodwill of these two public-houses is heritable. I therefore concur.

Feb. 17, 1905. Muirhead's Trustees v. Muirhead.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, and I concur with the views therein expressed. I think this case is ruled by the decision in Graham's Trustees[1] which was decided subsequently to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and that, in accordance with the principles of that decision, the values of both the goodwills here fall to be treated as heritable.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find (1) that the value of the goodwill, utensils, fittings, &c. of the business in Keppochhill Road, Glasgow, which belonged to the deceased James Muirhead, was, at the date of his death, £4000, and that, for the purpose of fixing the widow's legal rights, the goodwill of said business falls to be regarded as wholly heritable in its character; (2) that the sum of £11,600 obtained by the pursuers in March 1902, for the goodwill, utensils, fittings, &c. of the business in Springburn Road falls to be regarded for said purpose, in so far as it consists of the value of goodwill, as wholly heritable in its character; (3) that the value of the goodwill of the said Springburn Road business as at the date of the death of the said James Muirhead is to be taken at the sum of £10,600; (4) that the said sum of £10,600 is of the nature of a grassum paid by the tenant, to whom the said premises have been let, and is subject to the widow's claim for terce; and (5) that the said sum of £10,600, being the part of the value of the goodwill of the Springburn Road business, effeiring to the deceased's heritable estate, falls to be divided into ten equal parts, corresponding to the years of the lease granted by the pursuers to the purchaser of the Springburn Road business, and that accordingly, for the purpose of fixing Mrs Muirhead's terce, the rent for each year of said lease falls to be increased from £190, being the amount stipulated in the said lease, to £1250; and in respect of these findings rank and prefer the defender, Mrs Jessie Ballantyne or Muirhead, on the fund in medio to the extent of £353, 6s. 8d. per annum (being one-third of one-tenth part of said sum of £10,600) in name of terce, payable half-yearly so long as she is in life, for the period of ten years from and after the term of Whitsunday 1902, commencing the first half year's payment as at the term of Martinmas 1902, for the half year preceding, and with interest on said half-yearly payments at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, declaring however that the said terce is subject to deduction in respect of all debts which by law are deductible therefrom as at the death of the said James Muirhead: Reserving to the said Mrs Jessie Ballantyne or Muirhead all her claims to jus relictæ and terce out of the estate of her deceased husband, so far as not forming part of the fund in medio in this action, including all further claims for terce in respect of the property in Springburn Road, after the expiry of the current lease thereof: Rank and prefer the claimants, the trustees of the said James Muirhead, to the balance of the fund in medio, and decern."

Crofter—Bankruptcy—Forfeiture of tenancy precluding renunciation—Compensation for improvements—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), secs. 1, 3, 7, and 8—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 81.—The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, secs. 1 and 3, enacts that a crofter who shall do any act whereby he becomes notour bankrupt shall forfeit his tenancy and shall be liable to be removed by the landlord under sec. 4 of the Act of Sederunt, 14th December 1756.

Secs. 7 and 8 enact that a crofter shall be entitled, after one year's notice to his landlord, to renounce his tenancy, and upon such renunciation, or upon his being removed from his holding, shall be entitled to compensation for permanent improvements.

Where the estates of a crofter had been sequestrated, but his landlord had taken no steps to remove him, held that the crofter having been made notour bankrupt his tenancy was forfeited under section 3 of the Crofters Act, and consequently that he could not be called upon by the trustee to renounce a tenancy which no longer existed.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Ross-shire.

DONALD MACKENZIE, fisherman, Shader Point, Stornoway, was the holder of a croft No. 4 Shuilishader, New Lands, Stornoway, under Major Duncan Matheson of Achany and the Lews, upon which he had erected a dwelling-house and other buildings.

Donald Mackenzie's estates were sequestrated on 5th April 1904, and James Munro Mackenzie, law-clerk, Stornoway, was appointed trustee in the sequestration.*

The landlord took no steps to remove the bankrupt from his holding.

Thereafter the trustee in the sequestration, with a view to claiming compensation for improvements from the landlord, requested the bankrupt to execute a notice of renunciation of his tenancy as from Martinmas 1905 in favour of the landlord.†

Subsec. 6. The crofter shall not do any act whereby he becomes notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), and the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), and shall not execute a trust-deed for behoof of creditors."

Section 3. " . . . Where two years' rent of the holding is due and unpaid, or where the crofter has broken any other of the statutory conditions, he shall forfeit his tenancy, and shall be liable to be removed in manner provided by the fourth section of the Act of Sederunt anent Removing of the fourteenth day of December one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six."

Feb. 17, 1905. Mackenzie's Trustee v. Mackenzie.

The bankrupt refused to execute the renunciation, and on 4th June 1904 the trustee presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Stornoway in which he craved the Court to ordain the bankrupt to execute in favour of the landlord a renunciation of his holding in terms of the deed to be lodged in the course of the proceedings, and in the event of his refusing or delaying to do so "to grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend and imprison him within the prison of Stornoway, or such other prison as the Court may appoint, therein to be detained till he execute the said renunciation or conveyance, or till the further orders of the Court, and to grant warrant to the governor of the said prison to receive and detain the said Donald Mackenzie accordingly; and also to find and declare that the said Donald Mackenzie has forfeited the benefits of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and Acts explaining and amending the same."

The trustee averred, inter alia, that part of the debt under the sequestration was incurred by the defender in connection with erection of the dwelling-house on his holding, which, with other buildings, was of the value of about £300.

The defender in his answers denied that the buildings were of the value of £300, and averred that "most of the cost of the said buildings was contributed by the sons of the defender."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The bankrupt, being bound to make his estate available for the benefit of his creditors, should be ordained to execute the deed in question; and failing his so doing, warrant should be granted for his imprisonment as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The petition is incompetent. (2) The defender not being bound to grant the renunciation asked, the prayer should be refused, with expenses.

On 28th November 1904, the Sheriff-substitute (Squair) "repels the first plea in law stated for the defender, Donald Mackenzie: Sustains the first plea stated for the pursuer to the effect that the defences are irrelevant: Ordains the defender to execute in favour of Major Duncan Matheson, of Achany and the Lews, Lews Castle, Stornoway, a renunciation or other conveyance of the tenancy of the croft or holding No. 4 Shuilishader, New Lands Point, Stornoway, in terms of No. 2/6 of process after deletion of the words 'Martinmas 1905' and the substitution therefor of the words 'Whitsunday 1906'; and in the event of the said Donald Mackenzie refusing or delaying to do so, grants warrant as craved."

The defender appealed, and argued;—Section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act must be read in conjunction with the vesting clause (section 102) and the definition clause (section 4). The interest sought to be attached here was not "property" or "estate." It was a mere faculty, and in a worse position than a spes successionis, which a bankrupt could not be compelled to assign.[1] Further, by the defender's bankruptcy his tenancy had ipso facto been forfeited,[2] and could not now be renounced. A petition to remove a crofter from his holding by his trustee in cessio had been refused.[3] The policy of the Crofters Act was to give security of tenure and exclude creditors.

Mackenzie's Trustee v. Mackenzie.

Argued for the respondent;—The bankrupt's right to renounce had vested in the trustee, and the bankrupt could be compelled to execute the necessary deed.[1] The right to renounce was a heritable right, but even if it were held to be personal it could be affected by diligence.[2] There was no analogy between a right to renounce and a spes successionis. The former was a vested right which the bankrupt could make available at any time, and which emerged the moment he was removed by the landlord. It was not the policy of the Crofters Act to allow a bankrupt to wait till he got his discharge and then claim compensation, thus defrauding his creditors who had supplied the money for the buildings.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is a somewhat peculiar action.

The pursuer is trustee on the sequestrated estates of the defender, who is the tenant of a croft under Major Matheson of Achany, and he seeks to have the defender ordained to execute a renunciation of his croft, not in favour of himself, but of Major Matheson, his landlord.

The grounds on which the action is founded are that the defender has erected on his croft buildings to the value of £300; that a tenant has, under the Crofters Holdings Act, section 7, a right to renounce his tenancy, and when he does so, is entitled under section 8 to compensation from his landlord for permanent improvements executed by him on his holding; that the defender has executed such improvements, and is entitled to compensation therefor from his landlord; that the defender is bound under section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act to do all that may be necessary to make this compensation available for his creditors; and that it is necessary for that purpose that he should renounce his tenancy.

The Sheriff is of opinion that he is bound to do so, and, on 28th Novem- 1904, pronounced an interlocutor by which he ordained the defender to execute in favour of Major Matheson a renunciation of his holding in terms of a certain deed in process as amended by the interlocutor, and in the event of his refusing or delaying to do so, granted warrant for his apprehension and imprisonment.

It appears to me, however, that before determining whether the defender was bound to renounce his tenancy another question has to be determined, but which does not seem to have been considered in the Sheriff Court, and that is whether the defender was entitled to do so in the circumstances disclosed, or had any right in the tenancy susceptible of being renounced.

Section 1 of the Crofters Act provides that a crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant except in consequence of the breach of certain statutory conditions therein set forth. The sixth of these conditions is that the crofter shall not do any act whereby he becomes notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880.

The defender is certainly in breach of this statutory condition, and the penalty is to be found in section 3 of the Act, which enacts that when two years' rent of the holding is due and unpaid, or when the crofter has broken any other of the statutory conditions, he shall forfeit his tenancy, and shall be liable to be removed in manner provided by the 4th section of the Act of Sederunt anent Removings of 14th December 1756.

Section 7 of the Act enacts that a crofter shall be entitled, upon one year's notice in writing to the landlord, to renounce his tenancy as at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas. But that seems to me to assume the case of a crofter who has a right to remain for a year in his holding, and has no application to the case of a crofter whose tenancy is already forfeited, and who can be removed at any time by the landlord on giving the requisite notice under the Act of Sederunt.

The Act does not entitle a crofter to claim compensation for permanent improvements on forfeiture of his tenancy. The clause dealing with compensation is the eighth, which enacts that when a crofter renounces his tenancy or is removed, he shall be entitled to compensation. Assuming that a crofter who has forfeited his tenancy has any right to compensation at all, which I think very doubtful, it is only when the landlord proceeds to remove him that he is entitled to compensation. The landlord is the only person who has a title to remove him, but I see nothing to compel a landlord to remove a forfeiting crofter or to prevent him from allowing the crofter to remain as a tenant at will if he so pleases, or on such terms as they may agree upon.

It is said that this result would be very inequitable as regards the defenders' other creditors, who may have, and are said in this case to have, largely contributed to the expense of the buildings of which the defender will be left in the enjoyment. That may be so, but the matter is entirely statutory. The relations between landlord and crofter introduced by the statute are novel and peculiar, and possibly may have produced results which may not appear to be equitable as regards third parties. But however that may be, we must be guided by the statute alone, and for the reasons I have given I think the defender had no power to grant a renunciation of his holding after it had been forfeited. If that be so, it is unnecessary to consider the question which the Sheriff has dealt with, whether if he had the power he was bound to exercise it, as to which I give no opinion.

Assuming, however, that the Sheriff's interlocutor was right on the merits, I do not see how we could have affirmed it in the terms in which it is expressed. The Sheriff has ordained the defender to execute a deed of renunciation, and "in the event of his refusing or delaying" to do so granted warrant for his apprehension and incarceration—that is to say, he has left it to the messengers of Court to judge whether the defender has refused or delayed to execute the deed. I doubt whether they would have ventured to execute such a warrant. At anyrate the defender, after the case had been decided against him on the merits, was entitled to some little time to consider whether he would persist in his refusal. The Sheriff should have ordained him to execute the deed on or before a certain day, and, if he had not done so, then have granted warrant de plano for his incarceration.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the defender assoilzied.

Feb. 17, 1905. Mackenzie's Trustee v. Mackenzie.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have had the opportunity of seeing your Lordship's opinion, and I entirely concur. I only wish to add that while our decision relates to the case where the tenant has become bankrupt, it can have no bearing where the tenancy comes to an end by voluntary renunciation or by the landlord putting in force the statutory machinery for the recovery of his rent. I wish to reserve my opinion as to any future case of that kind which may raise a different question as to the construction of the statute.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion. I think the case turns on the 7th section of the Crofters Act. If it applied I would not, as at present advised, be prepared to alter the judgment of the Sheriff, because under the 81st section of the Bankruptcy Act a bankrupt is bound to execute such deeds as would increase his estate for the benefit of his creditors. But I am of opinion that the 7th section does not apply, and there is no other clause in the Act which entitles a crofter to renounce his holding. The appellant is in the predicament of a crofter who is in breach of a condition of his holding, and has forfeited it under section 3 of the Crofters Act, and section 7 cannot apply to a holding which has been forfeited; and we cannot ordain the appellant to execute a renunciation of a holding which has ceased to exist. I think the Act does not confer a right to compensation on a crofter who is in breach of the conditions of his holding.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and assoilzied the defender.

B predeceased the testator. C declined to accept office, and her eldest son was assumed as an executor. Held that B's eldest son being an executor as the successor and representative of his father was entitled to share in the bequest, but that C's eldest son was not so entitled.

1st Division. THE REVEREND JOHN GRANT MICHIE, minister of the quoad sacra parish of Dinnet, died unmarried on 21st January 1904, leaving a holograph last will and testament, dated 11th April 1901, and holograph codicil thereto, dated 14th March 1904. By his will the testator provided as follows:—"After the settlement of my pecuniary affairs—debts due to and by me—the residue of my property, personal and heritable, I leave to be divided into five equal shares (exclusive, however, of my books, pictures, works of art, and specimens of all sorts, which I propose otherwise to dispose of):—

My affection for her is as great as for any of my relatives. Should she predecease me, I wish her portion to be equally divided among the three first mentioned beneficiaries.

The reason why I thus dispose of this fourth of a share is that I believe these children are already better provided for than my other nephews and nieces. My brother James whom I have maintained since his return from Australia, having means of his own and no dependants, I have not included as a beneficiary.

"6th The remaining one and one-fourth share I wish to be devoted to the following purposes, viz.":—(1) Legacy to his housekeeper; (2) expense of tombstone and memorial tablet; (3) provisions as to books, &c., including this provision,—"As there are several rare books of history, science, and reference, I desire that these be parted among my executors as they shall agree among themselves. and Charles and my sister Jane, or their representatives, namely, the successor of each as representing their respective families." He also appointed two other persons to be executors.

The testator was survived by his brother William and his sister Jane, who both had children, all of whom were major at the date of the will. He was predeceased by his brother Charles, who left children who were in minority at the date of the will, but attained majority prior to the testator's death. John Lundie Michie, as the representative and successor of his deceased father the testator's brother Charles, accepted office and acted as an executor. The testator's sister Jane (Mrs M'Lean) declined to accept office, and her eldest son Robert M'Lean was assumed as an executor by the other executors.

Questions having arisen as to the interpretation of the will, this special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties to the special case were (1) the trustees; (2) William Michie and Mrs Jane Michie or M'Lean; (3) the children of William Michie and the children of Mrs M'Lean; (4) the children of Charles Michie; (5) the heirs in mobilibus of the testator other than the second and fourth parties; (6) the Committees of the Church of Scotland's Small Livings Fund, and of the Church of Scotland's Aged and Infirm Ministers' Fund.

The questions of law were, inter alia, as follows:—"1. Are the second parties (the testator's brother and sister, William and Jane) each entitled to demand immediate payment from the first parties of one-fifth share of the residue of the testator's estate, exclusive of the books, manuscripts, pictures, specimens, works of art, and relics mentioned in the will? or Are the third parties, the children of William Michie and the children of Jane Michie or M'Lean respectively entitled to immediate payment equally among them, from the first parties, of one-fifth share of said residue, exclusive as aforesaid? 2. In the event of the first alternative of the preceding question being answered in the affirmative, are the second parties each vested in the fee of one of the said shares of residue? or Are they each entitled to hold and administer one of the said shares of residue for themselves in liferent and their respective children in fee? or Are they bound to make immediate payment of the said shares to the third parties so soon as the same are received by them? 3. Are the fourth parties (the children of the testator's deceased brother Charles) entitled to demand immediate payment, equally between them, of the one-fifth share of residue bequeathed to Charles Michie for behoof of his family? or Does the said share fall to be divided among them and the second and fifth parties as intestate succession? 4. Are the whole expenses of administering the will, the estate and other Government duties exigible from the testator's estate, and legacy-duty a proper charge against the whole residue of the trust-estate before it is divided into fifths? or Are they, or any of them, properly chargeable against the one and one-fourth share of residue destined to the sixth parties? 7. Are John Lundie Michie as the successor and representative of his father in the office of executor, and Robert M'Lean, as the eldest son of his mother and an assumed trustee, entitled to share in the bequest of books, manuscripts, and collections of printed matter directed by the testator to be parted among his executors?"

which, inter alia, the parties craved the Court to add another alternative to the 2d question, and to substitute a question different in form for question 4, but in view of the way in which questions 2 and 4 were answered by the Court it is not necessary to refer further to these amendments.

Argued for the third parties;—(1) A gift to A for behoof of B constituted a trust for behoof of B.[1] "Family" here meant "children." William and Jane, the father and mother of the respective families, were not included. The children were therefore the sole beneficiaries; and the children so entitled to the beneficial interest were the children existing at the date of the testator's death, and not children post nati.[2] [LORD M'LAREN referred to Massy v. Scott's Trustees.[3]] If the parents were the beneficiaries, then logically the children of a predeceasing parent took nothing. That was obviously not the testator's intention. As there were no ulterior trust purposes and the beneficiaries were all of full age, the third parties were entitled to immediate payment.[4] The third parties also maintained alternatively that the second parties were bound each to hold and administer during their respective lives one of the fifth shares as trustees for their respective children. (2) The expenses of the whole trust, including estate and legacy-duty, were chargeable against the one and one-fourth share. "This" trust must mean the whole trust. The sixth purpose was not a separate trust. The only deduction to be made before the residue which was to be divided into fifths was ascertained was the debts due by the testator at his death. "Expenses" comprised everything necessarily paid by the executors in discharging their duty, including estate and legacy-duty.[5] Estate-duty was a payment due by the executor, and payment of it was a condition of administration.[6] Legacy or residue-duty was in the same position. It was payable by the executor, and must be paid before payment of the legacy or residue to the beneficiary.[7] The intention of the testator was that all payments not to beneficiaries except his debts should come out of the one and one-fourth share. Estate-duty at least was just as much expenses as any other stamp-duty, or the cost of obtaining confirmation. (3) The representatives of the deceased and of the declining executor were both entitled to share in the bequest to the executors. They were both executors as representatives.

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The intention of the testator was to benefit his brothers and sisters themselves. There was no purpose in mentioning William and Jane unless they were to have a beneficial interest. The bequest to Margaret and the destination over, the bequest to Anne's children, and the explanation of the omission of James, all shewed that he intended parents of families to be beneficiaries. If so, what was the extent of the beneficial interest intended in the case of William and Jane? The answer was that they were intended to be the sole beneficiaries to the extent of one-fifth each. The meaning of the words used was "to my brother, to enable him to provide for his family." Where the intention of the testator was in dubio, as between parent and children, the presumption was in favour of the parent.[1] There was no intention here to create a trust for the children. There was no object in doing so, as the children were all sui juris. There were no directions for carrying out such a trust. Where the directions were too vague to be carried out, that resulted in a gift absolutely to the primary donee. If there was a trust for children then payment could only be made after the death of the parent, as then only could the class be ascertained. This case fell under Carleton v. Thomson[2] rather than Wood.[3] If there was a trust at all it was a continuing trust. Some benefit was intended to be conferred upon the parents, and at least the parents were entitled to the income during their lives. If necessary the second parties would maintain that "family" included parent as well as children.[4] The cases cited for the third parties did not apply. (2) As to the meaning of "expenses of this trust," the second parties adopted the argument of the third parties.

Argued for the fourth parties;—(1) The fourth parties (the children of Charles) were entitled to take as conditional institutes. They could not take under the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit, which did not apply to provisions in favour of collaterals.[5] There was a clear intention that dependants (that is children) should benefit secondarily failing their parent, the primary beneficiary. If the gift was to the parent in trust for his children, and the children were the beneficiaries, the failure of the trustee could not prejudice them. (2) On the question as to expenses of this trust the fourth parties adopted the argument of the third parties. (3) The executor, who was acting as eldest son and representative of Charles, was entitled to share in the bequest to executors, but Jane's eldest son, who had been assumed as an executor in consequence of the declinature of his mother, was not so entitled. He was not the representative and successor of his mother. No one could be the successor of a person who was still alive.

Argued for the fifth parties;—(1) Under the destination to Charles for behoof of his family Charles was sole beneficiary. The fifth parties adopted the main contention of the second parties. There was no trust created for Charles' children. On Charles' failure the bequest to him lapsed, and fell to be dealt with as intestate succession. (2) As to "expenses," the fifth parties adopted the argument of the third parties.

Argued for the sixth parties;—"Necessary expenses of this trust" meant expenses connected with the sixth purpose, not the expenses of the whole testamentary trust. But apart from that, the expenses which were to be defrayed out of the one and one-fourth share did not include estate-duty or legacy-duty. Estate-duty was a sum by which all estates were diminished before the State would allow them to be administered. It must be deducted before the estate available for division could be fixed. It could not therefore be included under expenses of the trust. It must be deducted before the division into fifths could be made. The cases cited for the third parties on this point were single Judge decisions and not authorities. But the expressions "testamentary" or "executorship expenses," which were interpreted, were not the same as the expression used here. Necessary expenses of the trust only included proper expenses of administration, not a charge laid on by the State on the whole estate before it could be ingathered or apportioned. It was even clearer that legacy-duty was not included under necessary expenses of the trust. It was not an expense of the trust, but a charge laid upon the individual legatee. It was payable on payment to the legatee or retention for his behoof,[1] and it could be demanded from the legatee if not paid by the executor.[1] It varied with the degree of relationship, and attached to the particular legacy only. If it was intended that it should be paid out of residue and not out of the particular legacy, the only way in which that could be effected was to provide that the legacy should be paid free of legacy-duty. On the contention of the other parties, in every case where the trustees were directed in ordinary form primo loco to pay the expenses of the trust, that would involve payment of legacies free of legacy-duty. This had never been suggested before.

Lord Adam.—The questions in this case arise upon the construction of a holograph will and codicil left by the late John Grant Michie, minister of Dinnet.

Mr Michie directed the residue of his estate to be divided into five equal shares (exclusive of his books, pictures, &c.), and he bequeathed three of these shares in these terms, "I leave to my brother William, for behoof of his family, one share," and to his brother Charles and to his sister Jane one share each in exactly the same terms.

William and Jane, who are the second parties to the case, claim to be entitled to the fee of their respective shares, in respect that no effective condition limiting their right has been imposed by the testator. On the other hand, their children, who are the third parties to the case, claim immediate payment of the shares, in respect that they are the sole objects of the testator's bounty, and are now all of full age.

I see no reason to doubt that the children are right in saying that they are the sole objects of the testator's bounty. It is true that in the fourth purpose of the will, when dealing with one half share which he had bequeathed to his sister Margaret, he provides that should she predecease him her portion is to be divided among "the three first mentioned beneficiaries," referring thereby, no doubt, to William, Charles, and Jane, and again, in the fifth purpose, when dealing with one-fourth share which he had bequeathed to the children of a deceased sister, Ann, he explains why he had not included his brother James "as a beneficiary."

Were we construing a will prepared by a professional man, presumably well aware of the distinctive meanings of trustee and beneficiary, the fact that the testator had in his will described his brothers and sister as beneficiaries would have had much weight in determining whether they took as trustees or solely for their own benefit. But I can quite understand that the testator should consider it a benefit to them to put money into their hands to be expended for the good of their families, and so style them beneficiaries. In any view, I do not think that such considerations can prevail against the words in which the shares are given, viz., not to them for their own behoof, but expressly for behoof of their families, which I think clearly raises a trust in them for behoof of their children.

By giving these shares of succession to his brothers and sister for behoof of their children, the testator apparently intended that the parents should have the control and administration of their respective provisions. If they had had any minor descendants this intention might have received a certain effect during their minorities. But as the testator's nephews and nieces are all of full age, this intention cannot be carried into effect, because by the general law of this country, if a gift is made of a capital sum, the donor cannot limit the enjoyment of his gift except by giving an interest in it to some other person. As no persons other than the members of the respective families take any interest in the shares, and as no power of appointment is given to the parents, it follows that as to each family the bequest is subject to equal division, and that the legatees are entitled to immediate payment.

The testator's brother Charles, to whom he bequeathed one-fifth share for behoof of his family, predeceased him. The fourth parties are Charles' surviving children, and now claim his share as having vested in them at the death of the testator. This claim is opposed by the fifth parties, who maintain that the gift lapsed by Charles' predecease of the testator, and falls to be divided as intestate estate.

If I am right in thinking that the legacy to Charles, as in the case of his brother and sister, was, as trustee, merely in trust for his children, I see no reason for thinking that by reason of the predecease of the trustee the legacy to those who were truly the beneficiaries should fail. These children are now all of full age, and I think they are entitled to payment of the share as claimed, and accordingly that the first alternative of the third question should be answered in the affirmative.

The remaining questions are of a different character, and arise upon the construction of the sixth purpose of the trust, by which the testator disposes of the one share and a quarter share of the residue of his estate, which he had not previously disposed of. He directs his executors (1) to pay a legacy of £20; (2) to pay the expense of a tombstone and of a memorial tablet; and, in the third place, he disposes of his books, manuscripts, pictures, and certain other things. Then he provides as follows:—"The residue of the above-mentioned one and one-fourth share I desire to be apportioned to the following objects:—(1) After discharging the necessary expenses connected with this trust, to" (as altered by codicil) "the Church of Scotland's Committees of the Aged and Infirm Ministers Fund and of the Small Livings Fund, equally between them," and to certain other objects. The Church of Scotland's Committees in question are the sixth parties to the case.

The first question is what sums are to be deducted from the residue of the one and one-fourth share "as necessary expenses connected with this trust" before it is apportioned as directed by the will.

The sixth parties maintain that the words "this trust" mean the trust created by the directions contained in the sixth purpose of the will, and that only the expense of administering that trust should be charged against the residue. The second, third, fourth, and fifth parties, on the other hand, maintain that the expenses of administering the whole trust-estate fall to be so charged. I do not doubt that this latter view is right.

It will be observed that it is upon the settlement of the testator's pecuniary affairs, which he explains to mean the payment of debts due to and by him, that he desires the residue of his property to be divided into five shares. Nothing is said about the expenses of the trust being deducted or provided for before division. Had the testator said nothing about expenses, they would, no doubt, have been a charge against the whole estate. But he has provided for them, as I think, by making them a charge on the residue of the one and one-fourth share.

The next question is what is included under "necessary expenses," and, in particular, whether estate and Government duties, exigible from the testator's estate, and legacy-duty are included. In my opinion, only the legal and ordinary expenses incurred in administering the will are included. As regards estate-duty, that is a debt due by the estate which must be paid by the trustees before division, and I see no reason to suppose that the testator intended to include such a charge under the head "expenses." As regards legacy-duty, that is recoverable from the legatees, so that I do not see that any question arises with regard to it. There is no direction that the legacies are to be paid by the trustees free of legacy-duty.

I understand that the parties do not desire an answer to the fifth and sixth questions.

The seventh and last question is whether John Lundie Michie and Robert M'Lean are entitled to share in the books, manuscripts, &c. directed by the testator to be parted among his executors.

By the sixth purpose of the will the testator left his books, manuscripts, &c. to be disposed of by his executors as should seem to them to be best, with the request that should there be a parish lending library at Dinnet they should make a gift to it of such works as they should think suitable, and as there were some rare books of history, science, and reference he desired that these should be parted among his executors.

The nomination of executors is in these terms:—"I appoint the following to be my executors, viz.:—My brothers William and Charles and my sister Jane or their representatives, namely, the successors of each, as representing their respective families."

In order to participate in the gift an executor must, I think, have been appointed by the testator himself and have accepted the office. John Lundie Michie and Robert M'Lean appear to me to be in different positions. Charles Michie, John Lundie Michie's father, predeceased the testator, and John, as his father's successor, is appointed by the testator himself.

Michie's Executors v. Michie.

Robert M'Lean's mother, Jane, is still alive, but has declined to act as executor. Her son is not "her successor," and therefore had no right to the office, but he has been assumed as an executor. That being so, I think that John Lundie Michie is entitled to participate in the legacy, but that Robert M'Lean is not.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the first and second questions that the second parties are each entitled to demand immediate payment from the first parties of one-fifth share of the residue of the testator's estate, exclusive of the books, manuscripts, pictures, specimens, works of art, and relics mentioned in the will; but that the third parties, the children of William Michie and the children of Jane Michie or M'Lean, being now all of full age, are respectively entitled to immediate payment from the said second parties of one-fifth share of said residue, exclusive as aforesaid, each of said one-fifth shares being divisible among the respective children equally: Answer the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative, and the second alternative in the negative: Find in answer to the fourth question that the whole expenses of administering the will are properly chargeable against the one and one-fourth share of residue destined to the sixth parties; but find that such expenses do not include estate-duty, which falls to be paid by the trustees before division, nor legacy-duty: . . . Find in answer to the seventh question that John Lundie Michie, as the successor and representative of his father in the office of executor, is entitled to share in the bequest of books, manuscripts, and collections of printed matter directed by the testator to be parted among his executors; but that Robert M'Lean is not so entitled: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

Interdict—Interim Interdict—Prima facie title—Dissenting Church.—In 1900 a majority of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland passed an act uniting that Church with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the united Church to be called the United Free Church of Scotland.

In 1904 the Free Church of Scotland, composed of the minority of the original Free Church who had not entered into the union, obtained a judgment of the House of Lords to the effect that all the general property belonging to the original Free Church and held by trustees for behoof of that Church fell to be made over to trustees for behoof of the Free Church as it existed after the union. At the same time, in an action raised by the United Free Church against trustees holding church buildings in trust for behoof of the Buccleuch-Greyfriars congregation in Edinburgh for declarator that the said church buildings were held for behoof of the United Free Church congregation, the House of Lords held that the congregation of the United Free Church had no right to the buildings.

Thereafter the Free Church and the congregation of the Free Church at Strathpeffer, founding on these judgments, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the United Free Church and the congregation of the United Free Church at Strathpeffer, praying for interdict against the United Free Church congregation using the church at Strathpeffer, which was held on a trust title prima facie identical with the title of the Buccleuch-Greyfriars Church in Edinburgh.

The complainers having moved for interim interdict, the United Free Church congregation maintained that interim interdict ought not to be granted, in respect (1) that the judgments of the House of Lords were not res judicatæ against the present respondents, and were pronounced upon incomplete information as to the facts; (2) that the church at Strathpeffer had been built by subscription in 1886 after the original Free Church had (in 1873) resolved that there was no bar in principle to union with the United Presbyterian Church, while the Buccleuch-Greyfriars Church was built at a much earlier date, and that the subscribers to the building of the church at Strathpeffer as a body were in favour of the competency and the expediency of the union; and (3) that the Government intended to take immediate legislative action with a view to a settlement of the differences between the two Churches.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the church at Strathpeffer being held on a title prima facie identical, mutatis mutandis, with that of the Buccleuch-Greyfriars Church, interim interdict fell to be granted.

Bill-Chamber. 2D DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

THIS was one of a group of notes of suspension and interdict arising consequent upon the decisions of the House of Lords in the cases of The Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun, and of Macalister v. Young, Aug. 1, 1904 (H. L.), present vol., p. 1, and L. R. [1904], A. C. 515, and raising the question as to the right to the congregational property of certain congregations of the Free Church of Scotland as it stood at the time of the Union on 30th October 1900—the particular congregational property to which the present note of suspension and interdict related being the church at Strathpeffer.

The complainers were—(1) the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, acting through its Commission of Assembly, and the Moderator and Clerks of the said General Assembly as representing the said General Assembly and Church; (2) Colin Fraser and Donald Munro, "the whole existing and acting trustees for the congregation of the Free Church worshipping at Strathpeffer," appointed prior to 31st October 1900; (3) certain additional trustees appointed for the said congregation in December 1900; and (4) the Moderator and Kirk-session of the said congregation.

The respondents were—(1) the Reverend James Johnston and others, the minister and elders forming the kirk-session at Strathpeffer of the United Free Church of Scotland; (2) the Deacons' Court of the said congregation; (3) the said Minister, Elders, and Deacons' Court, as representing the said congregation; (4) the Moderator and Clerks of the United Free Church of Scotland, as representing the said Church; and (5) Donald Macrae and William Mackenzie "formerly trustees for the said congregation of the Free Church of Scotland, and now or lately members of or adhering to the United Free Church of Scotland, for any interest they may have."

General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland v. Johnston.

The prayer of the note was in substance for interdict against the respondents first, second, and third enumerated, officiating as minister, elders, and deacons respectively, within the property known as the Free Church at Strathpeffer, except with the permission in writing of the complainers second enumerated, with consent of the complainers first enumerated, and molesting the complainers in the peaceable possession of the said property, and for interim interdict.

The complainers averred;—(Stat. 4) "On 31st October 1900, the respondents, the Reverend James Johnston and others, separated themselves from the said Free Church of Scotland, and having associated themselves as a congregation in connection with the said United Free Church of Scotland, occupied the said buildings belonging to and held in trust for the congregation of the Free Church of Scotland. The complainers, other than those first enumerated, continued, along with others, associated together as a congregation of the Free Church of Scotland. . . . They have maintained in full order the organisation of such a congregation. The number of members and adherents of the congregation is 424 or thereby, a number which is greatly in excess of the members and adherents of the United Free Church in Strathpeffer." (Stat. 5) "The title to the church is contained in a feu-charter, dated 7th and 11th December 1886, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 25th January 1887, granted by Anne Mackenzie, Duchess of Sutherland and Countess of Cromartie," in favour of Alexander Macphail and others, as trustees for behoof of the Free Church congregation at Strathpeffer, and to the successors of the said trustees to be from time to time appointed in the manner provided in the disposition known as the Model Trust Deed. Of the said original trustees "Colin Fraser and Donald Munro are complainers, the others are deceased. The infeftment taken by recording the said title in favour of the original trustees enures to the benefit of the trustees now in office." The complainers averred that the feu-charter incorporated by reference the conditions and declarations from primo to duodecimo of the Model Trust Deed. (Stat. 6) "The terms of the foresaid feu-charter, in so far as relating to the present question, are similar to the terms of the title" in the case of Macalister v. Young. "The effect of the judgment in the said case, taken along with the judgment in the case of" The Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun, "is to declare that persons in the position of the respondents, who, prior to 30th October 1900, were members of the Free Church of Scotland, with certain rights in the property thereof, and who thereafter associated themselves with the United Free Church of Scotland as members thereof and otherwise, thereupon ceased to have any right or interest in the property of, or held in trust for, the said Free Church of Scotland or congregations thereof, and to be qualified to act as trustees therefor. The respondents have thus no title, right, or interest in the subjects referred to in this note."

Answers were lodged for all the persons called as respondents with the exception of those fourth enumerated.

The compearing respondents (Ans. 4) "Admitted that at the time of said Union these respondents adhered to the United Free Church and occupied the said buildings. Explained that at the time of said Union the total number of members and adherents of said Free Church congregation at Strathpeffer who adhered to the United Free Church and to the ministry of the respondent the Reverend James Johnston, exceeded those who declined to adhere to the United Church. Of the members fifty-four or thereby adhered to the United Free Church, while only thirty or thereby refused to adhere. Explained that the Act of Union was entirely within the competency of the Free Church, and that the property in question in this action now accordingly in fact belongs to the trustees thereof, none of whom are disqualified from acting as trustees by reason of being members of the United Free Church. Quoad ultra denied."

The compearing respondents further averred that the actions of The Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun, and of Macalister v. Young, were decided without proof; that facts essential upon the question of the position of the Free Church and its history and power to enter into the Union, and as to the rights to property held under the Model Trust Deed, were not before the House of Lords; that the compearing respondents were not parties to the said actions, and that the decisions therein were not res judicatæ against them; and that the complainers did not hold any decree against the respondents relating to the subjects mentioned in the prayer of the note.

In a statement of facts the compearing respondents further averred; —(Stat. 2) "It was intended and contemplated by the founders of the Free Church that the said Church should, as opportunity occurred, enter into unions with other churches in Scotland, and should, if it thought fit, change its name as it has done. . . . At the time of the Disruption there were several bodies of Protestant Presbyterian dissenters in Scotland, including the Secession Church, the Relief Church, and others. The Secession and Relief Churches united in 1847 and formed the United Presbyterian Church. The leaders of the Free Church in their public utterances at the time of the Disruption repeatedly declared that the principles of the Free Church did not differ on any essential or fundamental principle from those of the said Protestant Presbyterian dissenters, and they declared that they contemplated and looked forward to not only co-operation, but also incorporative union between the said bodies of Protestant Presbyterian dissenters and the Free Church. . . ." (Stat. 3) "Holding the views above set forth in regard to the union with other Churches, the Free Church at the beginning of her separate existence made provision for her congregational property being held by titles which expressly provided for the event of the said Church entering into such unions. The General Assembly of 1844 passed an Act entitled 'Act anent Trust Deeds,' enacting that the property of each place of worship be held as nearly as possible in the form of the Model Trust Deed contained in the Act. . . . It was the declared intention of the founders of the Free Church, as therein expressed, that the said Church should be entitled, as she saw fit, to enter into union with any other body of Christians, under any name or designation which she chose to assume, and that in so doing the said Church should not forfeit her right to the properties held by her in terms of the Model Trust Deed, but that on the contrary properties so held should continue to be used, occupied, and enjoyed as places of worship by congregations of the United Church. . . . The title founded on by the present complainers is in terms of and incorporates by reference the Model Trust Deed. . . ." (Stat. 4) " . . . The Free Church publicly declared, by resolution of her General Assembly of 1873, that there was no bar in principle to union with the United Presbyterian Church. . . . Since said date it has been well known to all the Church's members and adherents that the Church looked forward to an incorporating union with the United Presbyterian Church. . . . All gifts of money or property made to the Free Church since said date have been made in the knowledge of said declaration. . . ." (Stat. 6) " . . . The church property belonging to the Strathpeffer congregation was acquired in the years 1886 to 1887, long after . . . it was fully recognised by all parties that there was no bar in principle to union with the United Presbyterian Church. . . . Subscriptions were obtained for the building of the church. . . . A large body of the subscribers is still alive, and their views and the views of those deceased in favour not only of the competency, but the expediency, of the union are known. In point of fact, out of the £2000 or thereby subscribed, the sum of £18, 16s. is the total cumulo amount of the subscriptions of those who objected or object to the union. . . . Were interdict to be granted it would be in violation of the wish of the donors and of their views when their donations and subscriptions were given. . . ." (Stat. 7) "The respondents desire to state that, while maintaining their whole rights and interests in the premises, they have no desire for litigation in the matter, but on the contrary their desire is that the matters dealt with in this note, together with the whole questions now in controversy between the United Free Church and the Free Church, should be speedily settled without litigation, either by voluntary arbitration, or by the action of Parliament. This desire has been communicated to the complainers. Both parties are in fact aware of the intention of the Executive Government to take immediate action to achieve such a settlement. In these circumstances the present note of suspension is nimious and oppressive, and is intended to be a means of impeding the solution proposed to be found for the difficulties of parties. . . ."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The complainers having all the rights in the said subjects mentioned in the title-deeds herewith produced are entitled to have the note passed, and to interdict as craved, and in the circumstances, also to interim interdict. (2) The respondents having no right, title, or interest in the said subjects, or to the use thereof, and there being reasonable ground for believing that the respondents have nevertheless been using, and intend to use, the same unlawfully, to the deprivation of the complainers, interim interdict should be granted as craved.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) No relevant case. (3) The complainers having no right or title to the heritable subjects mentioned in the note, interdict should be refused. (4) The respondents being entitled to enter into the union of 1900, and not having forfeited thereby their rights and interests in said heritable subjects under the title-deeds produced, interdict should be refused. (5) The complainers' whole material averments being unfounded in fact and untenable in law, interdict should be refused.

On 6th December 1904, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Pearson) pronounced this interlocutor:—" Having heard counsel on the note and answers and considered the cause, passes the note, and grants interim interdict without caution." *

* " OPINION.—The case of Strathpeffer, which I have now before me, is the first of a group of cases which raise the question of the right to the congregational property of the Free Church as it stood at the time of the

The respondents reclaimed.

At the hearing it was stated that a commission had been issued by the Crown to inquire and report as to the matters in dispute between the Churches, and further that Sir John Cheyne, K.C., had been appointed as a commissioner to regulate questions of interim possession.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—At this stage the Lord Ordinary has taken the course of allowing interim interdict in this case. It is quite plain that he has done so upon a very careful consideration of the case presented to him, and certainly his note is a most excellent exposition of the grounds upon which he has proceeded. I must say that I see no ground for interfering with the judgment at which he has arrived on that preliminary question. It is suggested that there are certain things now before the Court that were not before the Lord Ordinary, but these things are not of the nature of cer-

Union in 1900. It is conceded that the note must be passed, and the only question I have to decide at present is the question of interim interdict.

"In considering this question, I must of course take special note of the distinction between this case and the similar application which was made in the New College case. There the property in question admittedly fell within the very terms of the judgment of the House of Lords, and my duty was little more than ministerial. Here there is no judgment applying to the property in dispute; and the respondents urge that those who are now seeking to turn them out have themselves no title to the property by declarator or otherwise. Now it is true that there has been no litigation between those particular parties; and, because of that, either party is free to make new averments, to state new pleas in law, and to put forward new grounds of judgment. But it is impossible, in deciding the question now in hand, to ignore all that has happened. Of course on this question of interim interdict, I can only deal with the matter provisionally; but it is certainly according to the practice of the Court in such cases to consider how the rights of parties appear on a prima facie aspect.

"First, on the question of title, the respondents contend that the subjects are vested in a body of trustees, and that that body is divided, and, so far as regards those whose names appear in the infeftment, equally divided. I think that is quite immaterial to the present question. The trustees are all here, and obviously they are divided because some have remained in the Free Church, while others have joined in the union. If it were necessary, it might be pointed out that under clause 7 of the Model Trust Deed, which is incorporated in their title, it is provided that in the event of any trustee 'ceasing to be a member of the said body or united body of Christians,' he shall ipso facto cease to have any right to act under these presents, and the trust shall thenceforward be conducted by the other trustees as if the trustee so ceasing were actually dead. True, the respondents say that the local trustees who are among their number have not ceased to be members of the united body of Christians there referred to, and that it is the trustees who are complainers that have done so. Prima facie, I think it is just the other way; for I have been referred to the opinions pronounced by a majority of the Lords on appeal in the cases of Lord Overtoun and Others and of Young v. Macalister, which appear to lay down distinctly, as matter of construction of this very trust-deed (the Model Trust), that the union there contemplated must be such as might properly be made without detriment to the distinctive tenets of the Free Church, and that the union founded on by the respondents does not answer that description. Without being res judicata against the present respondents, that is a judgment of the highest authority upon the construction of the same Model Trust Deed; and it is, tainties at all. It is now said that there has been a Commission issued by the Crown for the purpose of making certain investigations with the view possibly, or we may assume certainly, to the intervention of Parliament. But I do not think that that is a matter which a Court of justice is bound to take into consideration, and I doubt very much whether a Court of justice is even entitled to take it into consideration. I think the sole question before us is, have these reclaimers as the case stands any title so that they can resist meantime a motion for interdict? I think it is quite plain that, following out the judgment of the House of Lords, they have no title, and if they have no title in the ordinary case in a question of possession interdict would follow. There are many cases in which there might be no need for giving interdict, because the want of interdict would not lead to any damage or to anything contrary to the rights of the other parties in the meantime. Here it is quite plain that that is not so. It is quite plain

I take it, binding on all the Courts, except in a case where some workable distinction can be suggested.

"But after all, when once it is settled, as I hold it to be settled, that the law which is applicable is the law of trusts, it becomes apparent that the practical question is not so much as to the personnel or the title of the trustees, but as to the identification of the beneficiaries. And on this point, I take it that the judgments pronounced on both appeals are prima facie conclusive against the respondents. This is very clearly brought out by the circumstance that in the action of declarator it was declared among other things that even the United Free Church trustees hold the general property in the meantime for the Free Church beneficiaries.

"But it is urged for the respondents that however this may be, their case as here stated on the pleadings presents certain important considerations which were not put forward in those previous litigations, and upon which they undertake to shew after a proof that they are in the right. These are (1) that the opinions of the original leaders of the Free Church, when properly collected and weighed, negative the conclusion arrived at by the House of Lords as to the importance of the Establishment principle; and (2) that the title here, being dated in 1886, is not open to the same observations as was the case with the much earlier title founded on in the case of Young, and further that many of the original subscribers are still alive, and that their views and the views of the deceased subscribers are known to have been 'in favour not only of the competency but of the expediency of the Union.'

"I assume for the present purpose the relevancy of the respondents' averments on both these topics. But the question is whether they make any such difference in the prima facie aspect of the parties' rights as to entitle the respondents to prevail on this question of interim interdict. In my opinion they do not. The first of them involves the proposition that the case on this head was inadequately presented in the previous litigations, and that the present respondents could have done better—so much better as to compel a different decision. Now, that is quite within the bounds of possibility; but there is no such marked probability about it as to impair seriously the strength of the complainers' position at this stage. The other topic, namely, the inquiry into the intentions of the donors, comes more nearly up to what the respondents are in search of; and this is really the only point made which has caused me to hesitate in holding that the complainers' case for interim interdict is unanswerable. I have given every consideration in my power, within the time allowed, to the argument for the respondents on this matter of the wishes of the contributors, and to the full references which were made to the opinions delivered in the House here that without an interdict strife and confusion might go on in these places, and I think it is far better to follow the course the Lord Ordinary has taken to prevent that and to bring matters to a point in the meantime. What may happen in the future we do not know, but I entirely agree with the view the Lord Ordinary has taken, that the proper course to settle the matter in the meantime is to grant interim interdict. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree with your Lordship. I am entirely satisfied with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and do not desire to add anything to what he has so well said. I am the less disposed to do so because some of the topics with which the Lord Ordinary deals in their prima facie aspect may come before us later, and may have to be the subject of argument and decision. As to Sir John Cheyne's Commission, all I need say is that the existence of that Commission cannot, in my opinion, relieve this Court from the duty of dealing with these cases, which are cases competently before us, and of dealing with them just as we should deal with applications for interim interdict in any other cases which come before us.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary has very carefully considered the question of interim interdict, and I see no reason for disturbing the judgment which he has pronounced.

of Lords; and I have been unable to come to the conclusion that the statement of the donors' wishes and intentions is sufficient ground at the present stage for deciding against the complainers in the matter of interim regulation.

"Then it is said that there is about to be intervention by the Executive Government or by the Legislature, and it appears that a Royal Commission is about to be appointed. But all beyond that is quite vague, both as to time and as to the terms of reference. I would gladly have held my hand until this matter takes more definite shape. But neither party suggested that I should on that account postpone deciding the question of interim regulation one way or the other. The only use I was asked to make of it was to accept it as a reason for refusing interim interdict. But it is as yet at too early a stage to furnish me with a reason for doing that.

"I thought that perhaps a knowledge of the local circumstances of the two congregations, and of the facilities for accommodating them, might have some bearing on this question. I have been furnished orally by the parties with their respective views as to numbers and accommodation, with the result that I feel I can draw no safe conclusion in favour of either. The matter is, in my view, so obviously one for arrangement and regulation, especially having regard to the subject-matter in dispute, that it is with great reluctance that I give either party a temporary, and it may be a barren, victory by deciding the question of interim possession. But my reluctance is tempered by the consideration that the complainers made what, from their point of view, appeared to me a reasonable offer of joint use of the subjects, and that this offer was refused without any counter proposal being made."

PETER PRINGLE, Petitioner.—Constable. No. 92.

Process—Proof—Divorce—Proof and Oath de calumnia taken on commission before case called—Defender's objections to competency reserved.— A naval artificer-engineer, who was the pursuer in an action of divorce, presented a petition in which he stated that the summons in the action had been signeted and served edictally, but could not be called in Court until after the date when the ship upon which he and another material witness were serving was under orders to proceed to sea, and moved the Court to appoint a commissioner to take his oath de calumnia and the evidence of himself and the other material witness, the depositions to lie in retentis subject to the orders of the Court. The Court granted the prayer of the petition, reserving to the defender all objections competent to her to the competency of the petition. Feb. 21, 1905. Pringle.

PETER PRINGLE, artificer-engineer on H.M.S. "Berwick," stationed at Chatham, raised an action of divorce against his wife, Mrs Amelia Annie Russell or Pringle, then or lately residing at 53 Albany Road, New Brompton. The summons was signeted and served edictally on the defender on 20th February 1905, but could not be called in Court before 7th March 1905. 1ST DIVISION.

On 21st February 1905 Pringle presented a petition to the Court in which he set forth the above facts, and stated further that he was a domiciled Scotsman; that he and Alfred Baynton, gunner on H.M.S. "Berwick," were material witnesses in the cause, whose evidence was likely to be lost owing to the ship being under orders to proceed to sea with the Second Cruiser Squadron on 28th February 1905 before the expiry of the induciæ; that it was also necessary for the pursuer to emit the oath de calumnia; and that the defender had no known agent in Scotland.

The petitioner prayed the Court to appoint the petition to be intimated to the defender; to grant warrant to cite the said Alfred Baynton; to appoint a commissioner to take the petitioner's oath de calumnia and the evidence of the petitioner and Baynton; and to dispense with interrogatories, the depositions to lie in retentis.

Counsel for the petitioner referred to Clouston v. Morris, Feb. 15, 1848, 20 Scot. Jur. 228.

THE COURT, being of opinion that the prayer of the petition should be granted, reserving to the defender all objection competent to her to the competency of the petition, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant diligence at the instance of the petitioner for citing Alfred Baynton, gunner, H.M.S. 'Berwick,' and the petitioner, necessary witnesses for the petitioner in the action mentioned in the petition, whose evidence, owing to their being about to leave the country, is in danger of being lost; and grant commission to James Adam, Esq., advocate, to take the oaths and examinations of the said Alfred Baynton and the petitioner, and to receive any exhibits and productions made by them in regard to the matters at issue between the parties to the said action, at such time and place as the said Commissioner may appoint, due notice thereof being given to the defender or her known agent, and also to take the oath of the petitioner de calumnia in common form: Dispense with the adjustment of interrogatories, and appoint the depositions of the witnesses and productions, if

THOMAS KILLIN AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Respondents.—Younger—D. Anderson.
ALEXANDER CLARK WEIR, Defender (Appellant).—Munro—J. A. Christie.

Process — Summons — Competency — Several Pursuers — Community of Interest.—An action was raised at the instance of four pursuers concluding against one defender for separate sums of damages, on the allegation that the pursuers had been induced to purchase shares in a mining syndicate by false and fraudulent statements made to each of them by the defender at different times and different places, the statements in each case being of a similar nature.

Held that the action was incompetent, on the ground that the pursuers had no real and true community of interest.

1ST DIVISION. ON 22d September 1904, Thomas Killin, clerk, 168 West George Street, Glasgow; Finlay M'Fadyen, 79 Robertson Street, Glasgow; Thomas Torrance Crossgrove, 32 Midlothian Drive, Shawlands, Glasgow; and Colin Campbell, 1313 Pollokshaws Road, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton, against Alexander Clark Weir, Woodburn, Helensburgh, in which they sued the defender for separate sums of damages.

The pursuers averred that, on 21st November 1903, the defender, being then resident in South Africa, wrote to the pursuer Killin, bringing under his notice a gold prospecting company, known as the Hex River Main Reef Syndicate;—(Cond. 4) "In or about January 1904 the defender came to this country and called on the pursuer. He then informed him that he had purchased £10,000 of the shares himself, and that the shares were lying in his name with the secretary. He further stated that there was £5000 of the capital of the syndicate lying in the Bank at Johannesburg to meet the cost of boring and testing the ground, and that a bore was in course of being put down, and which was expected to reach the reef in three or four months. As a further inducement to take shares the defender expressed his willingness to pay the expense of an engineer selected by the Glasgow shareholders going from this country to be present when the bore reached the reef and give his report. The defender was introduced to the other pursuers by Thomas Killin in or about said month of February, and made similar statements to them and others, including John Leiper Gemmill, Parklea, Dumbuck, Glasgow, as to his holding in the company being £10,000; that he purchased said shares; that £5000 of the capital of the syndicate was actually in the bank for the purpose before mentioned; that a bore was being put down, and was expected to reach the reef in three or four months. All these statements were false and fraudulent, and were known to be so by the defender, and made by him to the pursuers and others with the express intention of inducing the pursuers and others to purchase shares in the concern." (Cond. 5) "The pursuers, believing in the sincerity and truth of the defender's statements and assurances as aforesaid, were induced to purchase from the defender shares in the said syndicate, as follows:—The said Thomas Killin, 100 shares at the price of £100; the said Finlay M'Fadyen, 150 shares at the price of £175; the said T. T. Crossgrove, 150 shares at the price of £150; and the said Colin Campbell, 50 shares at the price of £50."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having been induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the defender to purchase shares in the said company, they are entitled to repayment from him of the amounts respectively advanced to him, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent and irrelevant.

On 25th October 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Blair) repelled the defender's preliminary defences and allowed a proof, and on 9th December 1904 the Sheriff (Lees) adhered to this interlocutor.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The action was incompetent. The four pursuers were suing on different grounds of action.[1] The alleged misrepresentations were made at different times and different places.

Argued for the pursuers;—The action was competent. The false representation alleged was the same in the case of each pursuer, and the separate injuries for which damages were claimed arose from a single wrong.[2] There was clearly community of interest among the pursuers.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from interlocutors of the Sheriffs of Dumbarton, in the action at the instance of Thomas Killin, Finlay M'Fadyen, Thomas Torrance Crossgrove, and Colin Campbell, against Alexander C. Weir, in which each of the pursuers sues for separate sums of money, which they say are due to them in name of damages in respect of loss, which they have incurred owing to having taken shares in a certain syndicate induced by the false and fraudulent representations, as they allege, of the defender. The learned Sheriffs have allowed proof of parties' averments, but on appeal a point has been argued to your Lordships which does not seem to have been mooted in the Sheriff Court, viz., as to the competency of the action in respect that the four pursuers are allied together in suing for separate sums of money in respect of misrepresentations to them by the defender. I find that in an old, but respected, treatise on Forms of Process by Mr Ivory,[4] the rule is stated that, when several unconnected persons have been aggrieved by the same act of the defender, or have a joint interest in the matter libelled, one action in their joint names is perfectly competent, but that cases in which joint action is competent are limited to those of these two descriptions. I do not think the Court has ever departed from that rule. Indeed, so long ago as 1741, an attempt very much like the present seems to have been made in the case of Gray and Others, His Majesty's Feuars in Orkney, v. Sir James Stewart of Burray,[1] where the Lords found "that different parties could not accumulate their actions in one libel unless they had connection with one another in the matter pursued for or had been aggrieved by the same Act." I think all the cases that were quoted to your Lordships fell quite distinctly under one or other of these two categories. "Had connection with one another in the matter pursued for" means a case of which a very apt illustration can be found in the case of riparian proprietors. They represent property having a joint interest, and it has been held that they may quite appropriately combine themselves in one action to protect their common interest. "Being aggrieved by the same act," finds its illustration in the various cases quoted of actions of slander—where the ground of action is contained in one statement made once and for all implicating several persons and aggrieving them. I cannot find any amplification of these two principles, and I think it is very obvious that, on considerations of expediency, it would be regrettable if any amplification had to be allowed. I ventured to put the case in the course of the argument that if the misrepresentation complained of had been contained in a prospectus published in a newspaper, we might have had hundreds of persons coming together and all joining in one action for damages which they had sustained by this misrepresentation. The truth is that when the pursuers' averments are looked at there is no real and true community of interest. It is said that it was one and the same false representation. But then it was made to different persons, at different times, and to a certain extent at different places, and it is impossible to doubt that the words of the communication used to different persons differed at least a little in particulars, which may or may not have great importance when you come to determine whether these representations were false or not. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that we have no course but to dismiss the action as incompetent.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree in all that has fallen from your Lordship, and in the judgment proposed.

against her mistress and the husband of the mistress, the pursuer concluded for decree against the defenders "conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally or according to their respective liabilities as the same may be determined, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £400 sterling."

The pursuer averred a slander uttered in January 1904 by the wife when the husband was not present, and further averred that in February 1904 the husband "received a letter from the pursuer's agent specially stating the charges made by his wife. In his reply this defender repeated the slanderous statements" of his wife. "By this and subsequent letters he adopted responsibility for the statements" of his wife.

Held that the action was incompetent, in respect that it concluded for a lump sum as damages for separate slanders, one uttered by the wife and the other by the husband, without any averment of conspiracy or complicity.

Barr v. Neilsons, 6 Macph. 651, followed.

2D DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

IN September 1904 Marion Weston Hook, residing at Wilkieston, Midlothian, with the consent and concurrence of Robert Hook, her father, as her administrator-in-law, raised an action "against Mrs Margaret M'Callum, wife of and residing with James Y. M'Callum, dairyman, 7A Pitt Street, Edinburgh, and the said James Y. M'Callum as administrator-at-law for his said wife, and for his own right and interest,—defenders." The conclusion of the action was that "the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally or according to their respective liabilities as the same may be determined, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £400 sterling," with interest and expenses.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 1) " . . . The defender James Y. M'Callum, is a dairyman. He carries on business as such at Pitt Street, Edinburgh, and he resides there. The defender Mrs Margaret M'Callum is his wife. She, in conjunction with her said husband, carries on the said business for their joint interest. She manages all that concerns it at the shop which adjoins the dwelling-house in Pitt Street. In the conduct of their business the defenders employ a number of female servants." (Cond. 2) "On or about 24th November 1903 the pursuer Marion Weston Hook entered the defenders' employment as a domestic servant on a contract of service for six months. . . ." (Cond. 4) "On or about 21st January 1904, in the defender's shop in Pitt Street, the defender Mrs Margaret M'Callum falsely, maliciously, and calumniously stated to the pursuer Marion Weston Hook that she was fit only for gossiping and walking the streets, meaning thereby to accuse the said pursuer of being a person of loose, immoral, and vicious habits, or only fit to be a prostitute." (Cond. 5) "Further, on or about 24th January 1904, in the defenders' dwelling-house in Pitt Street foresaid, in the presence and hearing of the said pursuer's fellow-servants, named Isabella M'Phee and Christina Reid, both then residing at the defenders' dwelling-house foresaid, the defender Mrs Margaret M'Callum falsely, maliciously, and calumniously said of and concerning the said pursuer that she was untruthful and deceitful and that the said two fellow-servants ought not to associate themselves with her, or words of a similar import and effect." (Cond. 6) "On the same date and in the same place the defender Mrs Margaret M'Callum falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the said pursuer that she (the said defender) would lock the said pursuer's trunk, which lay in a bedroom of the house occupied by the said pursuer and one of her fellow-servants, so that if her fellow-servants' clothes were amissing it would be known where to find them. By that latter statement the said defender intended to accuse, and did accuse, the said pursuer falsely, maliciously, and calumniously of being a thief or capable of dishonestly secreting and stealing the property of her fellow-servants. At the time she made that slanderous statement the said defender unwarrantably opened and examined the female pursuer's trunk, in the lock of which the key stood at the time. Thereafter she locked the said trunk and placed the key in the shop, all without asking or obtaining the said pursuer's consent." (Cond. 7) "On 25th January 1904 both the pursuers called at the defenders' shop in Pitt Street. Delivery of the trunk referred to was there and then asked from the defenders. They refused to give it, and they called in a policeman, as if the pursuer Marion Weston Hook had been guilty of dishonestly secreting her fellow-servants' clothes or other property not her own in the trunk. The defenders were requested to state on what ground the imputations and accusations against the female pursuer's character had been made as hereinbefore stated. But the defenders refused to explain, and adhered to and refused to withdraw those imputations and accusations." (Cond. 8) "On the said occasions when the defender Mrs Margaret M'Callum slandered the pursuer as aforesaid, she represented her husband in the shop and business. The said statements were made by her of and concerning the said pursuer maliciously and recklessly, with an utter disregard for the pursuer's feelings, and in the knowledge that they were not true. Said statements were false and without any foundation. The defender James Y. M'Callum entirely approved of and adopted his wife's said statements. He was present at said interview on 25th January 1904, and identified himself with the defender Mrs M'Callum's statements and actings. He expressed his approval of the language used by his wife towards the pursuer, and further stated that his wife was justified in examining the trunk in the manner and on the occasion mentioned. In the month of February 1904 he received a letter from the pursuers' agent specially stating the charges made by his wife. In his reply this defender repeated the slanderous statement that the female pursuer was deceitful and untruthful. By this and subsequent letters he adopted responsibility for the statements and actings above condescended on, and adhered to them. . . ." (Cond. 9) "By the foresaid false, malicious, and calumnious imputations and accusations of immorality, untruthfulness, deceitfulness, and dishonesty against the pursuer Marion Weston Hook's character, she has been seriously wounded in her feelings, and her reputation, character, and credit have been greatly injured. The loss, injury, and damage which the pursuers have sustained and will sustain in the premises cannot be estimated at less than the sum sued for. . . ."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender Mrs M'Callum having falsely and calumniously slandered the pursuer Marion Weston Hook's character as stated, she is liable in reparation therefor. (2) The defender James Y. M'Callum having identified himself with his wife's statements and actings, and having approved of and adopted the same, he is liable in reparation. (3) The said pursuer having, as condescended on, suffered loss, injury, and damage, she is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action being incompetent ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

On 15th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling)

pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defenders, and, in respect thereof, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—A husband was not as a rule responsible for a slander uttered by his wife, but he might be if he identified himself with her in uttering the slander.[1] The husband here was not present when his wife uttered certain of the slanders complained of, but cond. 8 contained a relevant averment that he adopted the slanders which his wife had uttered, and thus identified himself with her in her statements. An issue therefore ought to be allowed in the form allowed in the case of Jack.[2] The pursuers, however, were willing that the action should be dismissed as against the husband, and that an issue should be allowed against the wife only. There was nothing in the case of Barr v. Neilsons[3] against the competency of such a course, which was supported by authority.[4]

Argued for the defenders;—The case was ruled by Barr v. Neilsons,[3] which had been followed in Taylor v. M'Dougall & Sons.[5] There were here an averment of slanders uttered by the wife when the husband was not present, and in cond. 8 an averment of a written slander uttered by the husband which the wife was not averred even to have known about. The case of Jack[2] was not in point, for there both defenders were present and were alleged to be acting in concert; there was no averment here that the defenders were acting in concert. Abandoning the action as against the husband did not make the action competent against the wife. If the action had been dismissed as irrelevant in so far as directed against the husband,—that was to say, if there was not a relevant averment of a slander uttered by the husband—then the action might have remained a competent action as against the wife, for in that event the only slanders relevantly averred would have been slanders uttered by the wife. That was the explanation of the cases of Milne,[6] Reilly,[7] and Baird's Trustees,[8] on which the pursuers founded. But it was not suggested that cond. 8 did not contain a perfectly relevant averment of a slander uttered by the husband. Consequently, even if the action was dismissed against the husband, it remained an action concluding for a lump sum in name of damages for several disconnected wrongs, with one of which at anyrate the wife was not alleged to have had anything to do; which was just the case of Barr v. Neilsons.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a long and interesting debate here. I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right. It is plain that the pursuer by his summons intended to attack both the husband and the wife, who are the defenders in this action, and that he desired to obtain a decree which should cover both. The averments against each are quite separate, and it could not be otherwise, because the slanders complained of which were uttered by the wife were uttered when the husband was not present. The ingenious mode of bringing him in and making him art and part in the slander said to have been uttered by his wife consisted in taking advantage of what he said or wrote; in this way it is said he adopted the slander uttered by his wife. It appears to me that that is an entire fallacy. If the male defender said or wrote things which shewed that he approved of the slander uttered by his wife when he was not present, the saying or writing of these things might amount to slander by the husband on his own account, but it never could make him participant in a slander uttered by his wife some time before when he himself was not present. The illustration was suggested of a joint assault. If two men attack a third, one hitting him on the head and the other on the shins, they may both be jointly and severally liable for the whole injuries, although it may be quite certain what specific part of the injuries was due to each, yet as the whole res gestæ come together when both are present, each is responsible for the whole; but if A is assaulted by B and is subsequently assaulted by C, then plainly there are two separate wrongs, for one of which B is alone responsible, and for the other of which C is alone responsible, and this even although the two assaults are separated by an interval of only ten minutes, and although B and C have the same ground, or supposed ground, of quarrel against A. It would be different if B and C were acting in conspiracy, but there must be specific averments of that. Here there are simply an averment of a slander uttered by the wife when the husband was not present and an averment of a slander uttered on a subsequent occasion by the husband, without any allegation of a conspiracy between the two. The pursuers have now intimated that they have abandoned the action against the husband, but when we look at the averments we have simply a case of different slanders uttered at different times and at different places by each of two defenders. That being so, I think that the action, in accordance with Barr v. Neilsons,[1] ought to be dismissed as incompetent.

Lord Kyllachy.—If the pursuer's case had been simply that Mrs M'Callum had on certain occasions slandered her, and that Mr M'Callum had identified himself with his wife's slanders so as to make them his own, it could not, I suppose, here be doubted that the action would have been a quite competent action; and further, that it could not have become incompetent merely because the Court on an examination of the averments found that the case against the husband was irrelevant. That is perfectly clear, and involves nothing contrary to the decision in the case of Barr v. Neilsons.[1] But when we come to examine the case before us it appears that, after averring as against both wife and husband various joint slanders, the pursuer goes on in condescendence 8 to aver as against the husband a separate slander uttered on a different occasion—a slander by the husband alone, and, so far as the statements shew, without any complicity on the part of his wife. The case therefore presented is one of various wrongs committed jointly by two parties, followed by an entirely separate wrong committed only by one of them, and on that case is rested a conclusion for a lump sum of damages against both parties or either of them. Now, I am afraid that this is just the kind of case to which the rule of the case of Barr v. Neilsons[1] applies, and that, I think, is enough for the decision of the question before us. I agree that the action as laid is incompetent, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The case of Barr v. Neilsons[1] has sometimes seemed to me to present some difficulty, but it is too late to discuss it now. It must be accepted as a conclusive authority, and the question we have to decide is whether it applies in the case before us. If an action for a lump sum is brought against A and B for a wrong done by A and a separate wrong done by B, then the case of Barr[1] applies, and the action is incompetent. This is the case we have here. There is an averment of a slander by the wife and an averment of a separate slander on a subsequent occasion by the husband, in which the wife was not participant. The case thus falls under the case of Barr,[1] and I therefore concur in your Lordships' opinion.

MRS RACHEL M'DONALD, Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt, K.C.—Munro.

JAMES DUNLOP & COMPANY (1900), LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—Campbell, K.C.—Hunter.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Negligence—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, subsec. (2) (b)—Action for reparation by person found not entitled to compensation—Election—Competency—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 1, subsec. (2) (b), enacts that when the injury is caused by the negligence of the employer, or of someone for whom he is responsible, "nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act."

Held that a claimant who had been refused compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, on the ground that she was not a dependant of the deceased workman, was not thereby barred from raising an action of reparation at common law, or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, against the deceased's employer.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 8th October 1903, John M'Donald senior, and his son, John M'Donald junior, miners, in the employment of James Dunlop & Company (1900), Limited, coalmasters, Calderbank, Airdrie, were killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of their employment.

Mrs Rachel M'Vey or M'Donald the wife of John M'Donald senior, and mother of John M'Donald junior, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie, in which she claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (1) in respect of the death of her husband, and (2) in respect of the death of her son.

On 30th December 1903 the Sheriff-substitute (A. O. M. Mackenzie) awarded Mrs M'Donald compensation, in respect of the death of her husband, but refused compensation in respect of the death of her son, on the ground that she was not a dependant of her son at the time of his death.

On 30th September 1904, Mrs M'Donald raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie, against James Dunlop & Company (1900), Limited, in which she sought decree against the defenders for payment of £500 at common law, or alternatively for £197, 18s. 6d. under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, as damages and solatium for the death of her son.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Pursuer having in the exercise of her option, under section 1, subsection (2) (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, elected to claim compensation under said Act from defenders, in respect of the death of her said son (said claim having been disposed of by interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, at Airdrie, of date 30th December 1903), the present action is incompetent, and should be dismissed with expenses. (2) The action is irrelevant.

On 15th November 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (A. O. M. Mackenzie) repelled these pleas and allowed a proof.*

* "NOTE.—(After narrating the facts)—It is argued that this subsection puts the workman or his dependant, in the case of the injury having resulted in death, to his election between the remedy provided by the Act and that which was open to him before the Act came into operation, and that, his election once made, he is barred from going back upon it, even although it turn out that he is not entitled to the remedy which he has selected. In my opinion, this argument is not well founded. If subsection 2 (b) be read in conjunction with subsection 1, it is, I think, apparent that the case to which subsection 2 (b) refers in the words 'in that case,' is the case of a workman who has a good claim both under the Act and independently of it, and accordingly it is with reference to that case that it gives the workman an option to select which of the two available remedies he prefers. It does not, in my opinion, contemplate the case of a workman or dependant upon whom the Act has conferred no benefit, and cannot fairly be read as meaning that the fact of such a workman or dependant having in error made a claim under the Act is to debar him from a remedy to which he had a right before the Act was passed. A reference to that part of the subsection which gives protection to the employer appears to me to support this view, for what the employer is protected against is not the having claims made against him both under the Act and independently of it, but the being found liable on both heads.

"I do not, however, require to rely on my own opinion of the meaning of the Act, for I think the matter is settled in accordance with the view I have expressed by the case of Blain v. Greenock Foundry Company, 5 F. 893.

"In that case certain of the children of the deceased William Blain sued his employers for damages on account of his death. In defence it was pleaded, inter alia, that one of the pursuers, James Blain, was barred from suing in respect that he had previously made an unsuccessful claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. This plea was repelled by Lord Kin-

No. 95.

Feb. 25, 1900. M'Donald v. James Dunlop & Co. (1900), Limited.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The appellant had elected to claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and had pursued that claim to a final judgment. She was therefore barred from now proceeding either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act. The policy of the Workmen's Compensation Act was to protect the employer against a double claim, and to provide that a claimant should make his election either to claim compensation under the Act, or to seek the remedy provided by the common law and the Employers Liability Act. Section 1, subsection (4), of the Act of 1897 provided for the converse of the present case, and it had been held in England that when a pursuer had failed in an action of damages against his employer, he could not at a subsequent date initiate independent proceedings for compensation under the Act of 1897.[1] In Rouse v. Dixon,[2] where it was held that a claim made under the Act of 1897 was not a bar to a subsequent action for damages, the claim for compensation had been withdrawn before the arbiter issued his award. Here the claim had been prosecuted to a final issue. In Blain v. Greenock Foundry Company,[3] the question now raised was not considered in the Inner-House.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the opinion of the learned Sheriff-substitute, who has in his note expressed the ground of his judgment very clearly. Besides that, I think it is almost impossible to distinguish this case from one branch of the case of Blain.[3] The matter there is undoubtedly dealt with by the Lord Ordinary at the end of his note,[4] where he says,—"The pursuer James Blain"—it may be noted that James Blain was one of the pursuers, but was not the principal—"is in a special position, because he made a claim under the former proceedings. But the result was that it was found that he had no title. His claim was not cairney, and his interlocutor was affirmed by the Second Division. The ground on which the claim of James Blain under the Act had been rejected was that he had no title, inasmuch as he had been only partially dependent on his father, and there were other claimants who had been totally dependent. His case was therefore identical for all practical purposes with that of the present pursuer.

"The same view has been taken by the Court of Appeal of Ireland—see Beckley v. Scott, Ir. R. [1902], 2 K. B. 504.

"I was referred to the case of Edwards v. Godfrey, L. R. [1899], 2 Q. B. 333, as an authority to the contrary. In this case it was held that a workman who had unsuccessfully sued his employer for damages, and who had failed to take advantage of the privilege given by section 1, subsection 4, of the Act of 1897 to have compensation assessed by the Court before which this action was tried, was barred from making any subsequent claim for compensation. The point decided therefore was not exactly the same as that raised in the present action. At the same time it must be admitted that the opinion of Lord Justice Smith is expressed in terms applicable to the present case. But if that decision is an authority for the view maintained by the defender, it is in conflict with the case of Blain, and it is the latter case which I am bound to follow.

"I accordingly repel the defenders' first plea in law, and as no argument was submitted in support of the plea to the relevancy, I repel it also."

repelled on its merits, but his title was denied, and I think his position is therefore not different from that of the other pursuers." That is a decision absolutely in point, and though it is true that no reference was made to this point by the learned Judges of the Second Division when they advised the case, at the same time the interlocutor adhering covers that portion of the Lord Ordinary's judgment as well as the others. And one is fortified by seeing that this was the view taken, though not absolutely necessary for the determination of the case, by the present Lord Chief-Justice in the case of Rouse v. Dixon,[1] because his Lordship there, after quoting the section, says,[2]—"That seems to me to point out plainly what are to be the consequences of the exercise of his option by the workman. They are, that the employer is not to be liable to pay compensation more than once. That being so, it seems to me that when a claim is made under the Workmen's Compensation Act which cannot be enforced because the case does not come within the Act at all, the right of the workman to make any other claim is not lost." That also is directly in point; and the matter certainly is strengthened when one comes to consider what the claim here is. The liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act is expressed in section 1 in, so to speak, a passive sense. It is said that if an accident arises the employer shall be liable to pay compensation; and then there is a proviso saving the rights at common law of the workman who is injured, and workman, as explained by the interpretation clause which follows, means not only the workman himself but, where he is dead, includes his legal representatives or his dependants or other persons to whom compensation is payable. That, of course, is compensation as provided for in the Act; but the pursuer's action here, in so far as it is a common law action, is an action founded on fault, which, under the law of Scotland, is not an action of compensation but is an action of damages, founded on the old Scottish doctrine which gave an action for damages to certain near relatives of persons who had been killed. I think that, even if the learned Judges in England had come to an opposite decision from what they did, it would be difficult to find this particular right excluded in a Scottish case. But I do not think it is necessary to rest the case on what must be called a specialty arising out of the difference of the law in the two kingdoms. I think it is enough for us that the result is in accordance with what one may call the common sense of the statute, which apparently means that the employer is not liable to pay twice. It is in accordance with the decision of the other Division of this Court in Blain's[3] case, and in agreement with the opinion of the Lord Chief-Justice of England.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. As I understand, the case arises in these circumstances: The pursuer raised proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation in respect of the death of her husband and her son. She succeeded in getting compensation in that action in respect of the death of her husband, but failed to get compensation for the death of her son, on the ground that she was only partly dependent on him, and therefore not entitled to compensation. She failed to make out her case, and, having failed to make out her case, now raises the present action of damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act. It is said that the action is incompetent, because she has made her election of proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and therefore is barred from proceeding at common law or under the Employers Liability Act. I agree with your Lordship that there is no bar at all. It is quite true that if the option is exercised by a person bringing an action of damages, and the person exercising that option fails in that action, then a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act must be disposed of by the Court at the same time; and for this reason, as it appears to me, that the whole facts of the case are before the Court upon which the Judge can award compensation; but that is not so in the converse case, and therefore there is no similar provision in the Act for dealing with that case. But I see nothing in that to prevent a claim for damages being made. I also agree with your Lordship that the case has in fact been decided by the case of Blain[1] in the other Division. I agree with that decision, and also with the arbiter's views on that case, and with the views expressed by the Lord Chief-Justice in the case of Rouse,[2] and I therefore think we should refuse the appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also agree. I think that under the Act the claimant is in a certain state of facts and for certain purposes put to his election, because the language of the Act is that where two grounds of liability exist the workman may either raise an action for compensation under this Act, or may take such proceedings as were open to him before the Act came into force. Now, an alternative is there given, and it cannot mean that he is to do both. Therefore I hold it would be contrary to the Act of Parliament to attempt to carry on the two claims concurrently, with the intention it might be of abandoning one, and proceeding with the one which promised the best results. But then, while an election exists in that case, it does not follow that it is an irrevocable election, and in the absence of any provision to that effect, and keeping in view the explanatory proviso that the employer shall not be liable to pay under both claims, I come to the conclusion that a workman may, if he pleases, abandon the claim first made and fall back on the alternative claim. In a case where the election has been to bring an action for damages, express provision is made that the Court while dismissing the action may proceed to award compensation under the Act, while the converse case is not expressly provided for. The Act of Parliament provides that the employer shall not be liable under both heads, and the language used appears to me to be consistent with a right on the part of the workman to change his ground provided the employer is not thereby subjected to a double liability. A decision on a claim for compensation, which is given by the statute independently of fault, can never be res judicata of a claim which is founded on fault. I therefore concur with your Lordships that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute is right.

Wilson v. M'Minnin.

WILLIAM M'MINNIN, Defender (Appellant).—Donald.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate Children—Aliment—Twins—Arrangement between the parents.—By arrangement between the father and the mother of illegitimate twins each parent took the custody of and supported one of the children. After this arrangement had been in force for about six weeks, the mother brought an action against the father for a yearly contribution towards the aliment of the child in her custody. Held that no ground being alleged for disturbing the agreement between the parents, the father was not liable hoc statu for the contribution claimed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh at the instance of Helen Wilson, domestic servant, Mayfield, Dalkeith, against William M'Minnin, gardener, Viewbank, Lasswade. On 26th July 1904 the pursuer gave birth to twin illegitimate children—boys—of which the defender admittedly was the father. By arrangement between the parents each took the custody of and supported one of the children. In September 1904 the pursuer brought the present action, in which she prayed for decree against the defender for £3, 3s. for inlying expenses (as to which the defender did not dispute liability), and for the sum of £7 a year for fourteen years as a contribution to the aliment of the child in the pursuer's custody.

The pursuer averred;—"The pursuer is a domestic servant, and after contributing to the maintenance of the child at present with her, she is unable to contribute anything towards the maintenance of the child with the defender."

The defender averred;—(Ans. 4) "Both parties, no doubt, are liable to aliment the children jointly, and any claim the pursuer may have against the defender is met by a counter claim on the part of the defender for the half maintenance of the one he is providing for. The defender is a working gardener, and if the pursuer maintains the child she keeps, and the defender the one he keeps, there will be no necessity for any contribution by either party."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defence is irrelevant. (2) The defender being the father of pursuer's child, is bound to contribute for its aliment, and her inlying expenses for both children.

The defender pleaded that in the circumstances he was entitled to absolvitor.

On 20th October 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that it is not disputed . . . (3) that a few days after the birth of said children the defender obtained the custody of one of them and the pursuer retained the custody of the other; (4) that since then each of the parties has maintained one of the children without contribution from the other; (5) that the defender has never disputed his liability to the pursuer for the amount of the inlying expenses incurred by her: Finds in law that in these circumstances mutual claims for contribution to the aliment of the respective children compensate one another, and that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied quoad the second crave of the prayer of the petition: Therefore ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £3, 3s. sterling, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from 26th July 1904 till payment: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defender, and decerns," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The material facts for the decision of the case are not in dis-

Wilson v. M'Minnin.

On 9th November 1904 the Sheriff (Maconochie), on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the appeal, sustains the same: Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Sustains the first plea in law for the pursuer: Repels the defences, and grants decree against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.*

pute. Illegitimate twin children are born as the result of carnal intercourse between the parties. Both father and mother are equally liable to maintain them. They give effect to that equal burden by each taking a child. Now, the mother wishes to disturb the equality of the total burden which rests upon them by causing the father to bear three-fourths of it while she only bears one-fourth. In the usual case, where only one child is in question, the parent having the custody of the child and expending what is necessary for its maintenance—in most cases the mother—has a right of relief for a half from the other parent as the proper contribution under the liability which rests equally on both parents. Although in most cases the mother has the custody, there seems no reason why, if the father takes the custody, he should not have a right of relief against the mother for her contribution. In the case of Alexander v. Robertson, January 15, 1883, Guthrie's Select Cases, 2d series, p. 13, decree was given in this Court by Sheriffs Rutherfurd and Davidson against a mother for aliment of an illegitimate child maintained by the father. In the present case, if the mother has a claim against the father for half of the cost of maintenance of one child, that claim is exactly met and extinguished by the claim which the father has against her for her half of the cost of maintenance of the other child. The pursuer's averments as to her ability to maintain the child do not, in my opinion, affect the question. Her action is one of relief, based upon the position that she is maintaining the child."

* "NOTE.—The defender admits the paternity of the child in question, and further admits that the pursuer and he are liable to aliment it 'jointly' (Answer 4). His sole defence is that the pursuer and he arranged that one of them should provide for one child (there happen to be twin illegitimate children), and that the other should provide for the other child. In these circumstances the defender maintains (Answer 4),—'Any claim the pursuer may have against the defender is met by a counter claim on the part of the defender for the half maintenance of the one he is providing for.' The Sheriff-substitute has found in law that the defender is not liable to contribute towards the maintenance of the child which is in the pursuer's keeping, on the ground that the 'mutual claims for contribution to the aliment of the respective children compensate one another.' I do not think that there is any room for the plea of compensation being given effect to. The debt sued for is a debt due not to the mother but to the child (Clarke v. Carfin Coal Company, July 27, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 63, see Lord Watson, p. 68), and the result of sustaining the defender's plea here would be to hold that the parents of an illegitimate child could by a contract entered into between themselves effectually deprive the child of the right to be alimented by both parents. Possibly (I give no opinion on the point) owing to the terms of the agreement averred there may be a question between the parents as to whether the defender is entitled to be repaid any part of the amount which he has expended on alimenting the illegitimate children, but that is a question which cannot, in my opinion, be decided in a case in which a debt due to one of the children is being sued for. I may, in conclusion, refer to the case of A B v. C D, February 12, 1842, 4 D. 670. There the mother had granted to the father a discharge of inlying expenses, 'and of all claims and demands competent to the said child on account of . . . aliment, due or to become due.' The Court there held that the mother was barred from claiming inlying expenses or past due

No. 96.

Feb. 25, 1905. Wilson v. M'Minnin.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The mother, not the child, was the true pursuer of the action, the claim being one of relief by the mother against the father.[1] Any claim by the mother in respect of the aliment of the child she was supporting was set off by the corresponding claim of the father against the mother in respect of the child he was supporting.

Argued for the pursuer;—A claim by the mother of an illegitimate child against the father in respect of the child's aliment was truly a claim by the child—not a claim of relief by the mother, and an arrangement between the parents could not interfere with the child's claim.[2] The aliment of illegitimate twins was not a unum quid, so as to entitle the defender to set off half the aliment of the child in his custody against the pursuer's claim for half of the aliment of the child in her custody. The two claims being each truly on behalf of the particular child could not be set off against each other.

Lord Kyllachy.—In this case I am satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. The case is somewhat peculiar, and the precise question involved has never, so far as I know, come up for decision. The position, I think, is this—twin illegitimate children are born, and an arrangement is come to between the parents that the father shall take one while the other remains with the mother. So far as appears this arrangement has as regards the children's interests worked well, and there has been no change in the circumstances of the parties from the time at which it was entered into—at least it is not alleged that any such change of circumstances has occurred. In these circumstances I do not think that any question arises here such as would arise if the mother became, for instance, disabled and could no longer support or contribute to the support of the child in her custody. There is nothing here to suggest that she is not as well able to support the child now as when she undertook the responsibility. I think, therefore, that as between the parties each is liable for the support of the child, that being the compact between them, and there being, so far as we can see, no reason, at least at present, for disturbing it.

Lord Kincairney.—I agree with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and think it should be returned to as giving effect to what is an equitable arrangement between the parties. I am not sure that I understand the legal grounds of the Sheriff's decision, but it involves the inequitable aliment, but refused to hold that the child was barred from raising through its administrator a claim for future aliment. There Lord Medwyn said,—'If this action were for the benefit of the mother alone I should hold it incompetent, but as regards the future aliment of the child I think it is a good claim.' Here no arrears are claimed, and on the authority of that case, and on general principle, it seems to me that with regard to future aliment the claim is good, and that the sole defence stated is irrelevant."

result of making the father liable for the maintenance of the children to the extent of three quarters, and the mother to the extent of only one quarter. No. 96. Feb. 25, 1905. Wilson v. M'Minnin.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the judgment proposed. Of course this arrangement can only continue so long as it is an arrangement between the parties, but the pursuer has not made out any case for disturbing it for the present.

THE COURT sustained the appeal against the Sheriff's interlocutor of 9th November 1904, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 20th October 1904, and with findings in fact and in law as in the latter interlocutor, of new decerned against the defender for payment of inlying expenses, and quoad ultra assoilzied the defender.

Process—Mandatary—Multiplepoinding.—In a multiplepoinding which had been brought in the Sheriff Court to determine a question under a codicil to a will, and in which the holder of the fund in medio had been exonered and discharged, two claimants residing in Australia, who had been called as defenders, appealed against a judgment of the Sheriff repelling their claim. The respondents (successful claimants) moved that the appellants should be ordained to sist a mandatary. The Court refused the motion.

THE REVEREND GAVIN ELMSLIE ARGO, The Manse, Kincardine O'Neil, brought an action of multiplepoinding as real raiser in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, in which he called as defenders James Pauline and others, including Isabella Janet Elmslie and Annie Elmslie, both residing in Melbourne, Australia. The multiplepoinding was brought for the purpose of determining the persons entitled to take under a codicil to the will of the late Rebecca Elmslie, by which she bequeathed to the real raiser a share of residue to be divided by him among her relatives answering to a description therein mentioned. 1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

By interlocutor, dated 21st October 1904, the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson Begg) of consent held the fund in medio to amount to £663, 2s. 5d., and found the holder thereof liable only in once and single payment, and upon consignation entitled to be exonered and discharged thereof, and appointed claims to be lodged.

Claims were lodged, and among others a claim for James Pauline and others, and a claim for Isabella Janet Elmslie and Annie Elmslie.

The Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor dated 13th December 1904, repelled the claim of Isabella Janet Elmslie, and found the claimant Annie Elmslie entitled, inter alios, to a thirtieth of the share of residue in question; but on appeal by the claimants, James Pauline and others, the Sheriff (Crawford) repelled the claims of both Isabella Janet Elmslie and Annie Elmslie, and found the other claimants each entitled to a twenty-ninth share of the share of residue in question. All the claimants were found entitled to expenses out of the fund in medio.

Elmslie v. Pauline.

The claimants Isabella Janet Elmslie and Annie Elmslie appealed to the Court of Session.

Upon the case being called in the Single Bills counsel for the respondents (successful claimants) moved that the appellants should be ordained to sist a mandatary, and argued;—In this case the holder of the fund had been exonered and discharged. The claimants were therefore now in the position of ordinary litigants, and the appellants, who were resident in Australia, should be ordained to sist a mandatary. The case of Gordon's Trustees v. Forbes[1] was distinguished. That was an action brought by testamentary trustees for the distribution of the trust-estate, in which it was probable that expenses would come out of the fund, and the pursuers and real raisers who made the motion for a mandatary had no interest to do so. In the case of North British Railway Company v. White[2] the question decided was as to the competency of the action, and the dispensation from sisting a mandatary was only hoc statu.

Counsel for the appellants were not called upon.

THE COURT refused the motion, and sent the case to the roll.

Process—Instance—Bankruptcy—Cessio—Withdrawal of Petitioning Creditor—Interlocutor pronounced without sisting party.—In a petition for cessio the Sheriff pronounced a deliverance ordaining the bankrupt to appear on a specified day for public examination. On the day appointed the petitioning creditor withdrew from the process, and the bankrupt did not appear. M., an agent for other creditors, appeared in Court, but none of them was sisted or otherwise made a party to the process. On M.'s motion the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor, by which he held the failure of the bankrupt to appear to be wilful, appointed a trustee in the cessio, and ordained the bankrupt to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in his favour. In an appeal, the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, on the ground that at the date it was pronounced there was no party in the process at whose instance a decree could be pronounced.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Kirkcudbright.

ON 20th January 1905 Messrs Rowan & Borland, drapers, Newton-Stewart, presented a petition for cessio in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, against James M'Lauchlan, dairyman, Mersehead, in the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright. On the same date the Sheriff-substitute (Napier) pronounced an interlocutor, whereby, inter alia, he appointed the pursuers to publish a notice in the Edinburgh Gazette that the petition had been presented, "and requiring defender and all his creditors to appear at ten o'clock forenoon" within the Sheriff Court House, Kirkcudbright, on 3d February 1905.

At the diet on 3d February M'Lauchlan did not appear, and Mr Saunders, agent for the pursuers, stated to the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuers' claim had been settled. The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Present, William Nicholson jr., solicitor for creditors: The respondent failed to appear after having been duly cited. The Sheriff-substitute holds his failure to appear wilful:

M'Lauchlan v. M'Lauchlan's Trustee.

Ordains the defender to grant a disposition omnium bonorum to Mr J. E. Milligan, solicitor, Dalbeattie, who is hereby appointed trustee for behoof of the defender's creditors," &c.*

Against this interlocutor M'Lauchlan appealed to the Court of Session. He lodged a minute, in which he stated that he had paid the pursuers' debt and expenses to Mr Saunders, the pursuers' agent. "Mr Saunders duly intimated to the Sheriff-clerk that the matter had been settled, and on the case being called in Court stated to the Sheriff-substitute that his clients' claims had been satisfied and that he withdrew the petition. Mr William Nicholson junior, solicitor, Kirkcudbright, however, then appeared and stated that he represented a creditor to the extent of £2, 10s. 6d., and desired the petition to be proceeded with. On his motion the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the interlocutor now appealed against."

The trustee appointed in the cessio, and certain unpaid creditors other than Rowan & Borland, having appeared to oppose the appeal, were ordained to lodge answers to the statements in the appellant's minute.

In their answers they admitted generally the truth of the statements in the minute, so far as quoted above.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff had no power to pronounce an interlocutor when there was no one left as pursuer in the petition. Conceding that if a petitioning creditor withdrew, other creditors might take up the process of cessio, still they could only do so by becoming parties to the suit. A right to appear in an action meant a right to appear legally by becoming a party to it in the appropriate manner, it did not mean a right to intervene casually without any procedure at all. The record of the proceedings must shew at whose instance the interlocutor of the Sheriff was pronounced, or at least that there was somebody in the process at whose instance such an interlocutor could be pronounced.[1] (The appellant also argued that the failure of the appellant to appear had not, in the circumstances, been wilful.[2])

Argued for the respondents;—All the creditors of the bankrupt were convened in a process of cessio, and were parties to the process.[3] There was nothing in the statute providing that a creditor appearing should lodge a minute or be sisted as a party, and the record of the proceedings sufficiently indicated, as was the fact, that the interlocutor of the Sheriff was pronounced on the motion of an agent for creditors.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very peculiar case, and I do not think I have seen one like it before. The facts, so far as ascertained, seem to be that a petition for cessio was presented, and a meeting appointed by the Sheriff at which the bankrupt and all his creditors were required to appear.

* The Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22), enacts (sec. 9),—"If the debtor fail to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum at any meeting to which he has been cited, and, if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may in the debtor's absence pronounce decree of cessio bonorum."

But before the date of the meeting the petitioning creditors withdrew and ceased to be the pursuers in the petition, with the result that at the date of the meeting there was nobody who could move anything in it at all. I have looked in vain in the proceedings for anything to shew that anybody appeared to take up the proceedings, even assuming (as I do) that it was competent for anyone to take them up. I find nothing in the proceedings except the statement in one place that a certain gentleman appeared for creditors. Who these creditors were, how many there were, and what their debts amounted to, there is nothing in the process to suggest. The Sheriff-substitute proceeded to hold that the debtor's failure to appear was wilful, and pronounced decree of cessio. So far as the proceedings shew, I must assume that the Sheriff did that ex proprio motu. It was not said that he did it on anybody's motion; it was not said that anyone was sisted in the cessio or entered the process by minute or by any of the ordinary ways known in judicial procedure. The Sheriff pronounced the decree of cessio of his own accord, and in my view it was not competent for him to do so. It was competent on the motion of anyone who had right to be there to pronounce such a judgment if he were satisfied that it was the right judgment to pronounce; but if there were nobody there in a position legally to make such a motion, I do not think the Sheriff could pronounce the decree ex proprio motu.

But passing this by, the next point is whether at that time the process was in such a condition that the Sheriff could pronounce any judgment in it at all. There was at that time, so far as the proceedings shewed, no instance whatever to support the process, and in any proceedings, civil or criminal, which I have ever seen, if there is no instance, there can be no legal or binding judgment. This by itself is sufficient for the decision of the case.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled and the case remitted to him to proceed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur. The case being decided on the grounds stated by your Lordship, we are relieved of the necessity of considering whether the failure of the appellant to appear at the meeting was wilful failure in the sense of the statute.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. I should always be reluctant to recall the judgment of a Sheriff on a point of form, especially in a process of cessio, but I do not think it is possible to allow this interlocutor to stand. The decree pronounced was practically a decree in absence. That is quite right if there is a pursuer in the action. But it can never be right if there is no pursuer; and in this case there was neither a pursuer nor a defender, nor any creditor who had made himself a party to the action. On that ground I agree with your Lordships that the judgment should be recalled.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 3d February 1905, and remitted to him to proceed of new.

MISS ESTHER BLANCHE DALZIEL, First Party.—Macphail.
ARTHUR HENDERSON AND OTHERS (William Henderson's Testamentary Trustees), Third Parties.—Hunter.

Succession—Faculties and Powers—Validity of Exercise of Power—Whether power exercised or not—Partial Invalidity—Exercise by General Settlement—Power to appoint among issue—Appointment to daughter in liferent, with fee to her issue as she should appoint—Power to daughter to give liferent to husband.—In a deed of settlement by way of indenture between A, a married woman, and trustees, it was, inter alia, agreed that the trustees should hold the trust funds in trust for A's issue, at such ages or times not earlier than twenty-one or marriage, in such shares, and in such manner, as she should appoint. In a hotchpot clause reference was made to any "child who or any of whose issue shall take under such appointment."

By her will A bequeathed to other trustees the whole residue of her estate, "including all property over which I have power of appointment," upon trust, after payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies, to hold for her two children (a son and daughter), or such one of them as should attain twenty-four, or die under that age leaving lawful issue, the daughter's share to be retained and the income paid to her during life, and the capital after her death to be held for her issue, "whether children or remoter descendants," in such manner as she should appoint, with power to her to appoint to her husband, if he survived her, not more than a moiety of the income during his life. Held (1) that A by her will intended to exercise, and had exercised, the power of appointment reserved in the settlement; (2) that the exercise of the power was not invalid in respect of its taking the form of a conveyance to other trustees who held other funds, and, inter alia, for purposes which could not be satisfied out of the funds which were the subject of the power; (3) that the expression "issue" in the settlement included remoter descendants than children, and that consequently the daughter's issue were objects of the power; (4) that the testatrix had validly exercised the power by giving a liferent to her daughter with a power of appointment of the fee among her issue, and the fee to her daughter's issue as the daughter should appoint; (5) that the daughter's husband not being an object of the power the will was not a valid exercise of the power in so far as it gave the daughter right to provide a liferent to her husband, but that this provision was to be held pro non scripto, and did not affect the validity of the exercise of the power otherwise.

A had also under her father's will a power to appoint among her issue "born or to be born during" her life, "or within twenty-one years after her death," with such future or other trusts for their benefit as she should appoint.

Held that A had also validly exercised this power by her will except in so far as she gave right to her daughter to provide a liferent to her husband, and in particular, that the exercise of the power was not necessarily invalidated owing to A having given her daughter power to appoint to issue,

Trust—Termination—Funds held by trustees under an inter vivos settlement, for issue subject to power of appointment—Power exercised by will—Whether settlement or testamentary trustees to hold fund.—Where under an inter vivos settlement trustees were directed to stand possessed of trust funds for the issue of the settlor, as she should appoint, and this power of appointment was validly exercised by the settlor in her will, by which she directed the whole residue of her estate to be held by her testamentary trustees for certain purposes, held that the settlement trustees were in the circumstances bound to pay over the settlement trust funds to the testamentary trustees.

1ST DIVISION. THESE two special cases were presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the question whether the late Mrs Esther Dalziel had validly exercised by her will (1) a power of appointment reserved by her in a deed of settlement by way of indenture between her and certain trustees; and (2) a power of appointment conferred upon her by the will of her father, the late William Henderson. The first special case related to the power reserved in the settlement, and the second to the power conferred in the father's will.

First Special Case.—By deed of settlement, dated 4th December 1890, in the form of an indenture between Mrs Esther Dalziel, wife of Andrew Dalziel, chemical manufacturer, Irvine, and Stonehewer Parker Freeman and others, as trustees, on the narrative that Mrs Dalziel had paid to the trustees the sum of £14,105, 12s. 7d. belonging to her as her separate estate, it was agreed that the trustees should retain the trust funds upon trust to invest the same in their names, and should pay the income to Mrs Dalziel during her life, and after her death to her husband, if he survived, so long as he should remain unmarried; "And from and after the death of the said Esther Dalziel and the death or second marriage (which shall first happen) of the said Andrew Dalziel, shall stand possessed of the trust funds in trust for all or any one or more of the issue of the said Esther Dalziel . . . at such ages or times, age or time (not being earlier as to any object of this power than his or her age of twenty-one years or day of marriage), in such shares, if more than one, and in such manner as the said Esther Dalziel shall by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment and so far as any such appointment shall not extend, in trust for all the children of the said Esther Dalziel . . . who being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry, in equal shares, and if there be only one such child the whole to go to that one child; but so nevertheless that no child who, or any of whose issue, shall take any part of the trust funds under any such appointment as aforesaid shall be entitled to any share of the unappointed trust funds without bringing the share or shares appointed to him or to her or to his or her issue into hotchpot and accounting for the same accordingly unless the person or persons making such appointment shall thereby direct to the contrary, and if there be no such child, then in trust for the said Esther Dalziel absolutely."

Mrs Esther Dalziel died on 17th May 1896, predeceased by her husband, and survived by a daughter, Esther Blanche Dalziel, who attained majority on 16th February 1901, and a son, Ralph Cannan Dalziel, who was still a minor.

Mrs Dalziel left a last will and testament, dated 17th December

No. 99.

Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees.
Dalziel v. Henderson's Trustees.

1894, by which, after providing for certain legacies amounting in all to £300, and bequests of jewellery, she gave and bequeathed to James Pipe and others as trustees "all the residue of my estate and effects, real and personal, and of what nature or kind soever, and including all property over which I have any power of appointment" in trust. By this will the testatrix provided as follows:—"(5) I direct my trustees, out of the money to arise from the sale and conversion of my said real and personal estate, and out of my ready money, to pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and any legacies bequeathed by this my will, or by any codicil hereto, and to hold the residue of the said money upon trust, to invest the same . . . and I declare that my trustees shall hold the said investments . . . upon trust for my said two children, Esther Blanche Dalziel and Ralph Cannan Dalziel, or such one of them as shall attain twenty-four years of age, or die under that age leaving lawful issue, and if more than one, in equal moieties, but so that the share of my said daughter shall be retained and held on such of the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same as shall be subsisting and capable of taking effect. (6) My trustees shall retain the share of my said daughter in the trust fund, upon trust to pay the income thereof to her for her life without power of anticipation during any coverture, and after her death the capital and income of her share . . . shall be held in trust for all or any one or more exclusively of the others or other of the issue of my said daughter, whether children or remoter descendants, at such time, and if more than one, in such shares and with such gifts over and generally in such manner for the benefit of such issue, or some or one of them, as my said daughter shall, whether covert or sole, by deed revocable or irrevocable, or by will or codicil, appoint . . . and I declare that if there should not be any child of my said daughter who, under the trusts, in default of appointment hereinbefore contained, attains a vested interest in her share, then, subject to the trust and powers declared in favour of my said daughter and her husband and issue, her share shall be held in trust for such person or persons as my said daughter shall by will or codicil appoint. Provided always . . . that . . . my said daughter may, . . . at any time after she shall have attained twenty-one years of age, by deed revocable or irrevocable, or by will or codicil, appoint to or in favour of any husband of hers, in case he should survive her during his life, or any less period, one moiety or any less part of the annual income of my said daughter's share of the trust fund. . . ."

The residue of Mrs Dalziel's estate, exclusive of that held by the settlement trustees, amounted to £6516.

Questions having arisen with regard to the disposal of the trust funds under the settlement, the present special case was presented to the Court. The parties to the case were:—(1) Miss Esther Blanche Dalziel, (2) Ralph Cannan Dalziel, (3) the trustees under the settlement, and (4) the trustees under the will.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Do the directions in Mrs Dalziel's last will and testament for the disposal of the residue of the estate referred to therein constitute a valid appointment in exercise of her power under the deed of settlement of 4th December 1890 only in so far as they direct her trustees to hold the funds in trust for her son and daughter, or such one of them as shall attain twenty-four years of age or die under that age leaving issue, and if more than one in equal moieties? or (2) Are the trusts imposed by said last will and testament upon the share therein appointed to the first party also valid as in exercise of said power of appointment? or (3) Does the said last will and testament not constitute to any extent a valid exercise by Mrs Dalziel of her said power of appointment? (4) In the event of the first or second question being answered in the affirmative, are the fourth parties entitled to have the fund settled by said deed of settlement, or any and what part thereof, paid over to them by the third parties, to be held and administered for Mrs Dalziel's children in terms of the directions contained in said last will and testament?"

Second Special Case.—By his last will and testament and trust-disposition and settlement, dated 30th April 1877, William Henderson, chemical manufacturer, Glasgow and Irvine, who died on 31st December 1880, and who was the father of Mrs Esther Dalziel, referred to in the first special case, conveyed all his estate and effects, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. Mr Henderson directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the residue in trust for his children; that they should invest the daughters' shares in the trustees' names, and pay the income to each daughter during her life, and that after the death of each daughter they should stand possessed of her share "in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other, of the issue of such daughter, born or to be born during the life of such daughter, or within twenty-one years after her death, if more than one, in such shares, and with such future or other trusts for the benefit of the said issue, or some or one of them, with such provisions for their respective maintenance and education or advancement, at the discretion of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, or of any other persons or person, and upon such conditions, with such restrictions, and in such manner as such daughter shall, by deed or writing under her hand, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by will or codicil appoint; and in default of such appointment, and so far as any such appointment shall not extend, in trust for all or any the children or child living at my death, or born afterwards, of such daughter, who, being a son or sons, attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters, attain that age, or marry under that age with the consent of her or their guardians or guardian for the time being, and if more than one, in equal shares: Provided always that no child of such daughter, who, or whose issue, shall take any part of the same trust-estate under any appointment made by such daughter in pursuance of the power in that behalf hereinbefore contained, shall, in default of appointment to the contrary, have, or be entitled to any share of the unappointed part of the same trust premises without collating the share or shares appointed to him or her, or to his or her issue, and accounting for the same accordingly."

Mrs Esther Dalziel, a daughter of William Henderson, died on 17th May 1896, survived by the two children mentioned supra, p. 546, and leaving a last will and testament, the terms of which, so far as material, are quoted supra, p. 547.

Questions having arisen with regard to the disposal of the funds held by the trustees under Mr Henderson's will this special case was presented to the Court.

The parties to this special case were (1) Miss Esther Blanche Mar. 9, 1905. Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees. Dalziel v. Henderson's Trustees.

The following question of law was, inter alia, stated:—"(1) Was the power of appointment conferred on Mrs Dalziel by Mr Henderson's last will validly exercised by her in her last will and testament, and if so to what extent?"

After Mrs Dalziel's death a special case had been submitted to the Court by (1) Mr Henderson's trustees, (2) Mrs Dalziel's testamentary trustees, and (3) the tutors and guardians of Esther Blanche Dalziel and Ralph Cannan Dalziel (Esther Blanche Dalziel and Ralph Cannan Dalziel, who were then both minors, not being parties to the case), in which it was decided by the Court, on 5th February 1898 (not reported), that Mr Henderson's trustees were not bound to convey Mrs Dalziel's share of Mr Henderson's trust-estate to her testamentary trustees, but were bound to hold and administer her share subject to the powers and directions contained in her will.

First Special Case.—Argued for the first party, Miss Dalziel;—(1) Mrs Dalziel did not by her will intend to exercise, and did not exercise, the power of appointment reserved in the settlement. A power of disposal and a power of appointment were different. The power here was a power of appointment, not a power of disposal. What the testatrix did was to dispose, not to appoint. A power of disposal could be exercised by a general conveyance in trust for purposes, but a power of appointment which required division among the objects of the power could not. Here there had been no appointment among the objects of the power. (2) Assuming that the power had been exercised, it was not validly exercised. There was no power to adject conditions such as had been imposed by the will. Mrs Dalziel could not give her daughter less than a share of the fee. She could not give her merely a liferent.[1] The daughter's issue were objects of the power, but the will contained no appointment to them. It merely gave the daughter a delegated power to appoint among them. This was not a valid exercise of the power. Further, the daughter's husband was not an object of the power, and the power given to the daughter to appoint part of the income to him was ultra vires. The exercise of the power was therefore either wholly invalid,[2] or alternatively, (3) it was invalid except in so far as it gave the first and second parties each an equal moiety of the funds. This in the result would have the same effect as if the power had not been exercised. Where the invalid part of the exercise of the power was separable, and after it was read out the power was still completely exercised, which was the case here, then the exercise of the power might be held good, the invalid part being treated pro non scripto.[3] The first party therefore maintained that she was entitled to payment of one-half of the funds under the settlement.

Argued for the second party, Ralph Dalziel;—He adopted (1) and (2) of the argument for the first party, and cited In re Cotton.[4] The power if exercised at all had not been validly exercised to any extent.[1] Mrs Dalziel's will not merely conferred benefits on persons not objects of the power, but it conferred only a contingent right upon the second party, who was a proper object. He got nothing under the will if he died before he was twenty-four. Mrs Dalziel could not validly make the second party's right to a share contingent upon his attaining the age of twenty-four. It was impossible to separate the invalid part of the exercise of the power. It was impossible to say what the donor of the power would have done if she had known that she could not validly do what she did. The exercise was therefore wholly invalid, and the second party was entitled to payment of one-half of the funds under the settlement upon attaining the age of twenty-one. Cattanach's Trustees v. Cattanach[2] and M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees[3] were distinguishable. In these cases the invalid part of the exercise could be separated. Here there was no gift to the son which could be separated from the invalid qualification.

Argued for the third parties, the settlement trustees;—(1) Mrs Dalziel's will was an exercise of the power. A general testamentary deed was presumed to exercise a power of appointment unless something appeared to the contrary. It was not a good objection that the power was exercised by creating a trust and as part of her general disposal of her whole estate.[4] (2) The power had been validly exercised. It was competent to limit the daughter to a liferent. She might have been validly excluded altogether or given merely an illusory share.[5] The fee had been validly disposed of. At least grandchildren were objects of the power. "Issue" was not "children" only, but included also remoter descendants. The power was very wide. As regards the son there was power to postpone to twenty-four. The only limitation as to age was that it was not to be earlier than twenty-one. (3) A delegation of power to appoint was competent under this power. In any view it could not invalidate the exercise of the power. It was an amplification of the gift to the daughter, not a limitation, and the grandchildren were objects of the power. But it was not correct to say that this was a delegation of the power. What was given was a liferent to the daughter coupled with a power of appointment. That had been held to be a valid exercise of powers similar to the present.[6] (4) The funds must continue to be held by the settlement trustees.[7] Mrs Dalziel had no power to bring the settlement trust to an end by conveying away the funds to another set of trustees. The question was practically settled by the decision in the former special case.

Argued for the fourth parties, the testamentary trustees;—They adopted (1), (2), and (3) of the argument for the third parties, and cited In re Swinburne[1] and Dykes' Trustees v. Dykes.[2] With regard to the question which set of trustees should administer the settlement funds, the proper course was that the settlement trust should be brought to an end and the funds handed over to the testamentary trustees.[3] This was undoubtedly what the testatrix intended, and the balance of convenience was all in favour of that course. There was no absolute rule in such cases. The case of Busk v. Aldam[4] merely decided that the Court in such circumstances had a discretion, and that being so their discretion should here be exercised in favour of the testamentary trustees. As to the previous special case, it was not reported, and the grounds of judgment were not known.

Second Special Case.—The first and second parties, Miss Dalziel and Ralph Dalziel, stated an argument similar to that stated for them in the first special case, but the first party conceded that under the power here in question it was competent to restrict her to a liferent. It was further contended that in this case the exercise of the power, if exercised at all, was invalid, because under the power issue born more than twenty-one years after Mrs Dalziel's death were not objects, and under her will power was given to her daughter to appoint among issue irrespective of that limitation.

Argued for the third parties, Henderson's trustees;—They adopted generally (1), (2), and (3) of the argument for the third and fourth parties in the first special case, and cited Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn.[5] With regard to the power specially here in question, it was not a mere power to divide as in Baikie's Trustees v. Oxley & Cowan,[6] and other cases cited for the first and second parties. The intention was that the donor should have right to dispose of the share subject to the power. "Future or other trusts" were specially authorised. Restriction of the daughter to a liferent with power of disposal was valid under this power. Such a power authorised appointment among grandchildren. The exercise of the power was indeed not wholly valid. The power to appoint to a husband was invalid. The appointment to grandchildren or remoter descendants generally as the daughter should appoint, without restriction to those born within twenty-one years of Mrs Dalziel's death, might or might not include persons not objects of the power as it might turn out. But the parts of the exercise which were invalid were separable, and could be read out, leaving the valid part standing.[7] This was specially the case here where the donee of the power specially provided that the conditions were only imposed so far as capable of taking effect.[8] The provisions as to the daughter's husband, and, if descendants born after twenty-one years were not objects of the power, the provisions in their favour, were incapable of taking effect, and were to be read out.

No. 99. At advising,—

Mar. 9, 1905. Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees. — Dalziel v. Henderson's Trustees.

FIRST CASE—Dalziel's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mrs Esther Dalziel, a married lady, possessed of separate estate, executed on the 4th December 1890 a deed of settlement in English form (which I shall refer to as the settlement) by which she conveyed a sum of £14,000 odd of her separate estate in trust to three persons. These trustees, who are the third parties to the special case, were to hold the funds for payment of the interest thereof to Mrs Dalziel during her life, and to her husband if he survived her. After the death of Mrs Dalziel, and the death or second marriage of her husband, the trustees were to hold the trust funds—(His Lordship read the direction from the deed of settlement, supra, p. 546).

Mrs Dalziel was predeceased by her husband and died on 17th May 1896 survived by two children, Ralph Cannan Dalziel, the second party to this case, and still a minor, and Elizabeth Blanche Dalziel, the first party, who is now twenty-four years of age and unmarried. She left a last will and testament dated 17th December 1894 (which I shall refer to as the will) by which she left to trustees, who are the fourth parties to this case, "all the residue of my estate and effects, real and personal, and of what nature or kind soever, and including all property over which I have any power of appointment."

We are informed that Mrs Dalziel was possessed of estate other than that held by the third parties, to the extent of £6000 odd.

The trust purposes need not be read at length. The trustees are to realise, converting real or heritable estate into cash. They are to pay debts and invest, and then they are to hold upon trust—(His Lordship read the direction in Mrs Dalziel's will, supra, p. 547).

The succeeding trust purposes may be sufficiently described by saying that they restrict the daughter's right to a mere liferent, giving the fee to her children or remoter descendants as she may appoint, and with power to her to provide a liferent of a certain amount to a surviving husband.

The first and second parties unite in contending that there has been no valid exercise of the power of appointment. The interest of the second party, the son, is limited to the point that if he can take under the settlement in default of an appointment he will get his moiety when he attains twenty-one, whereas if he takes under the will he has to wait till he is twenty-four. The interest of the daughter, the first party, is more considerable, as it involves the difference between a fee and a liferent.

The first party further contends that even if the will operates as a valid exercise of the power of appointment, yet it is only effectual in so far as it conveys a moiety to the first and second parties, and that the succeeding declarations as to the trusts upon which the first parties' moiety are to be held are ultra vires so far as affecting the settled funds, and fall to be disregarded. The practical result of this is to her the same as that sought to be reached by the first contention.

The third and fourth parties unite in resisting the contention of the first and second parties, maintaining that the power of appointment in the settlement was well exercised by the will, and that the trusts of the will fall to be administered. They contend as against each other as to which of them are the proper body of trustees to administer the trusts of the settled funds.

It would be unavailing even if it were possible to attempt to set forth a complete analysis of the cases which have been decided on the branch of law involved in these questions, a considerable number of which have been cited to your Lordships. But there are at least two principles which stand clearly out from the decisions, which will, I think, be sufficient to try the contentions of parties in the present case.

The first is that no exercise of a power of appointment can be good in favour of persons who are not objects of the power. This is one of those propositions the mere statement of which would seem to dispense with the need of authority. But there are many cases which are examples of its application, and a good and recent instance of a case to which the first party would wish to assimilate the present may be found in the case of Neill's Trustees v. Neill,[1] where, under a power given to a liferentrix to appoint the fee to her children, per stirpes, in such proportions and subject to such conditions and restrictions as she chose, it was held that an appointment by which she cut down the interest of certain of her children to a liferent and gave the fee to grandchildren was bad, as it made no appointment of the fee except to persons who were outside the power.

The second proposition is that, when an appointment is duly exercised in favour of objects of the power, any further restrictions or stipulations which are sought to be imposed, but which are, upon a just consideration of the terms of the power, ultra vires of the person who exercises the power, fall to be disregarded and held pro non scripto, but do not invalidate the exercise of the power in favour of the objects thereof. An example of this proposition may be found in the leading case of M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees,[2] where the gist of the matter is set forth in an oft quoted sentence of Lord Chancellor Cairns, which for convenience of reference may be here quoted again,—"From all those cases the plain rule is to be derived, that if you cannot disconnect that which is imposed by way of condition or mode of enjoyment from a gift, the gift itself may be found to be involved in conditions so much beyond the power that it becomes void. But where that is not so, where you have a gift to an object of the power, and where you have nothing alleged to invalidate the gift but conditions which are attempted to be imposed as to the mode in which that object of the power is to enjoy what is given to him, then the gift may be valid and take effect without reference to those conditions."

Turning now to the contentions of parties in the present case, the argument of the first and second parties that there is here no valid exercise of the power of appointment possessed by the late Mrs Dalziel is based on two separate grounds. They say that as a matter of construction the will does not seem to exercise it, because it does not in terms say that it is exercising this power, and further, because it begins with a general conveyance to trustees of all things belonging to the granter, whereas the power did not contemplate a conveyance to other trustees than those who held under the settlement. As regards the point that the will does not in terms say that it is exercising the power, that has been settled as immaterial by a long series of decisions, beginning, so far as our Courts are concerned, with the case of Milne;[1] and when we come to the conveyance to trustees, viewed as a question of construction, in this case it is very hard to say that there was no intention, inasmuch as there are the words, "including all property over which I have any power of appointment." The counsel for the first party were driven to contend that by power of appointment here was not meant power of appointment but power of absolute disposal. The sufficient answer seems to be that it is a safe rule to begin with believing persons to mean what they say; and that in this case that prima facie view is not displaced when we find that the testatrix had under two instruments powers of appointment over other property, and had not, so far as brought to our notice, any absolute power of disposal.

Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees.

The second ground of argument is that apart from construction a conveyance to trustees must be a bad exercise of the power. That must be on the ground that the trustees are not objects of the power. In one sense that is true. But then the conveyance to them is merely formal, the beneficial interest is given to others. Accordingly one is not surprised to find that there is a long series of English decisions in which it has been held that, when the person in right of a power makes a general conveyance to trustees, and imposes on those trustees some duties which obviously cannot be satisfied out of the funds which are the subject of the power, such as, e.g., the payment of the testator's own debts, yet this form of conveyance will not vitiate a proper exercise of the power. An example of the partial application of the same doctrine will be found in our Courts in the case of Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees.[2] I am therefore of opinion that Mrs Dalziel did intend to and did validly exercise by her will her power of appointment under the settlement. This disposes of the contentions of the second party, the son. There remains the further contention of the first party, the daughter, that the limitations sought to be imposed on her moiety are invalid, and ought to be disregarded. To succeed in this she must shew that, in so far as the will gives rights to the grandchildren, it gives to objects outside the power.

Now, the power says that the funds may be held for "issue" of Mrs Dalziel in such "manner" as she may direct. It is now well settled that the primary meaning of issue includes all descendants—MacDonald v. Hall.[3] It is true that the context may shew that it is intended in a more limited sense, as was held in Cattanach's Trustees,[4] where it was clearly synonymous with immediate children only. But here, so far from shewing a limited sense, the context seems to me to shew clearly the other way; because, in the concluding proviso as to hotchpot, we find the expression "no child who or any of whose issue," an expression which cannot be satisfied without holding that the original term "issue" includes at least grandchildren.

In so far then as the will gives in the "manner" that it confers a life-rent on Esther Blanche and a fee on her issue, it seems to me not to go beyond the objects of the power.

There remains a power proposed to be given to Esther Blanche to provide a liferent to a possible husband. Such a person would be an object outside the power. But this part of the case comes, I think, clearly within the second general proposition, which I ventured to lay down; and accordingly it may be disregarded without affecting the validity of the exercise of the power in other respects.

There remains the question as between the two sets of trustees brought forward in the special case to which allusion is made in the other case. At the time that special case was presented the beneficiaries were not in the field, and consequently it could not be decided whether there was a proper exercise of the power or not, and accordingly eo statu it was better for the first trustees to hold. I think Mrs Dalziel sufficiently indicated by the massing of her funds that she wished her whole moneys to be managed by one set of trustees. I am therefore for giving the testamentary trustees the management of the funds. I do not lay down any general rule. Each case must be judged on its own circumstances. Nor do I think that is at variance with the judgment of the other Division of the Court. On the whole matter I advise your Lordships to answer the questions submitted as follows:—The first in the negative, the second in the affirmative, the third in the negative, the fourth in the affirmative, and to find it unnecessary to answer the fifth question.

SECOND CASE—Henderson's Trustees.

In this case the first and second parties are the same as in the case just disposed of. The third parties are the testamentary trustees of the late W. Henderson, who was the father of Mrs Dalziel, and under whose will there was a fund held for Mrs Dalziel in liferent, over which she had a power of appointment.

The contentions of the parties are really identical with those in the last case, with the exception that here there is no competition of administration between the trustees who presently hold the appointable funds and the testamentary trustees of Mrs Dalziel, because these persons have already had a special case before the other Division of the Court on the subject, in which it was held—and the matter is thereby res judicata—that Mr Henderson's trustees, i.e. the trustees holding the appointable funds, must continue to hold.

The observations which I made to your Lordships in the previous case, so far as general, and so far as relating to the form of expression used in the will, are clearly applicable to the present. The only question which demands separate treatment will therefore be the argument of the first party seeking to shew that the conveyance effected by the trusts of Mrs Dalziel's will is a conveyance to objects outside the power; and for that purpose it is necessary to look at what the power of appointment was in Mr Henderson's deed. By Mr Henderson's deed his trustees were to divide his property into shares, and to hold the shares for behoof of each of his children. The proviso as to daughters provided that they were to have a liferent and —(His Lordship read the provision in Mr Henderson's deed, supra, p. 548).

Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees.

Dalziel v. Henderson's Trustees.

This proviso seems to me to be if possible even clearer than the proviso in the last case as shewing that "issue" is not confined to immediate issue, because you have the expression "issue of such daughter born or to be born during the life of such daughter or within twenty-one years after her death." There is further the proviso for the making of "future" trusts for the benefit of such issue. It is said that by the trusts of Mrs Dalziel's will it is possible that Esther Blanche may confer a right on issue who will be born more than twenty-one years after the death of Mrs Dalziel. The answer is that there is no reason that she should do so, and that, if she does, so far it will be an ultra vires act; but on the principles already commented on these considerations will never invalidate Mrs Dalziel's appointment. I am of opinion that this case is therefore substantially identical with the last case, and that the questions fall formally to be dealt with as follows:—

To answer the first question by saying that the power of appointment conferred on Mrs Dalziel by Mr Henderson's will was validly exercised by her in her last will and testament, and that the funds held by Mr Henderson's trustees, and subject to such power of appointment, fall now to be held under the trusts declared by Mrs Dalziel's will, and to find it unnecessary to answer the other questions.

LORD ADAM concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD M'LAREN, who was absent at the advising, also concurred.

LORD KINNEAR, who was absent at the hearing, did not take part in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors:—

In the first special case: "The Lords having considered the special case and heard counsel for the parties, answer the first and third questions therein stated in the negative: With regard to the second question, find and declare that the trusts imposed by Mrs Dalziel's last will and testament upon the share thereby appointed to the first party are invalid as in exercise of the power of appointment reserved to her under the deed of settlement of 4th December 1890, in so far as they purport to confer upon the first party any power of appointment in favour of any husband whom she may marry: Quoad ultra find the said trusts are a valid exercise of said power of appointment, and answer the second question accordingly, and answer the fourth question in the affirmative," &c.

In the second special case: "The Lords having considered the special case and heard counsel for the parties, find and declare with regard to the first question that the trusts imposed by Mrs Dalziel's last will and testament upon the share thereby appointed to the first party are invalid as in exercise of the power of appointment reserved to her under the last will and testament and trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Henderson, dated 30th April 1877, in so far as they purport to confer upon the first party any power of appointment in favour of any husband whom she may marry: Quoad ultra find that said trusts are a valid exercise of said power of appointment, and answer the first question accordingly," &c.

Reparation—Negligence—Duty to Public—Starting crane without warning and swinging box over horse's head.—In an action of damages for personal injuries brought by a carter employed by a firm of contractors against a company of quarrymasters, the pursuer averred that when at the defenders' quarries in charge of a horse and bogie, and while he was spragging his bogie, the defenders' craneman suddenly and without warning started a crane, making a great noise and swinging a box over the horse's head, causing the said horse to jump and rear and draw the bogie on top of the pursuer, and that the accident was caused through the fault of the defenders' servants in not warning the pursuer of their intention to start the crane, as was usual in such operations, and in swinging the box near the horse's head; and that the system adopted by the defenders was dangerous in that, although the craneman could not see the pursuer from the crane, the defenders failed to provide a man at the face of the quarry to give warning to pursuer and other workmen. Held that these averments were irrelevant.

MICHAEL BRESLIN, carter, Renton, brought an action of damages for personal injuries in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton, against the Clyde Quarries, Limited, Dumbarton. 1ST DIVISION.

The pursuer averred that on 17th June 1904 he was in the employment of George Manners & Son, contractors, Dumbarton, who had contracted for the conveying of stones from the defenders' quarries to the railway on bogies drawn by horses; that on said date, having led his horse to the quarry face, he proceeded to sprag his bogie, when, as he was doing so, "suddenly and without warning of any kind, the defenders' craneman, Libburn, caused the crane of which he was in charge, and which was standing in a field above the face of said quarry, to commence working, making a great noise, and swinging a box which was attached to the chain of said crane over said horse's head, causing said horse to become restive, and jump and rear, and draw the bogie to which said horse was attached off the rails on top of pursuer, injuring him severely." (Cond. 4) "Said accident was caused through the fault and negligence of the defenders or of their servants, for whom they are responsible, in not warning pursuer of their intention to start working said crane, and in swinging the box attached to the chain of said crane over and near to said horse's head, causing it to become restive. . . . The pursuer relied, and was entitled to rely, on the fact that it is usual in said quarry, as in all well conducted operations of this kind, to give warning by shouting that said crane was about to be started to work. . . . Further, the system adopted by defenders was attended with danger to pursuer and the other workmen, in that the defenders' said craneman was not in a position to see the pursuer from his place on the platform of said crane, and defenders ought to have placed a responsible and competent party, which they did not do, at the face of said quarry, either to warn pursuer and the other workmen of the danger owing to the crane being worked, or to inform said craneman of the presence of the pursuer and other workmen in the quarry. Pursuer avers that the defective system of working said crane, and the negligence of defenders' servants in not warning workmen of their intention to start working said crane, have previously caused accidents in said quarry. This was in the knowledge of defenders."

Part of Condescendence 4 above quoted was added by way of amendment after the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action as laid is irrelevant.

By interlocutor, dated 1st November 1904, the Sheriff-substitute (Blair) sustained the defenders' first plea in law and dismissed the action.*

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who, after allowing the pursuer to amend his statements, by interlocutor dated 9th December 1904 recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and allowed the parties before answer, and under reservation of all pleas, a proof of their averments as amended.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and lodged a proposed issue for the trial of the cause by jury.

The defenders maintained that the action was irrelevant, and argued;—It was not said that the horse was within the sweep of the crane. The fair implication was that it was not. It was not alleged that the noise was unusual. The pursuer was bound to have in contemplation that the crane would be worked with the usual noise, and if his horse was liable to be alarmed by such working he ought to have taken precautions for himself.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—It was not merely the noise of the crane that alarmed the horse. It was also the swinging of the box near its head. The defenders were responsible in respect that no warning was given, and no man provided to give warning.

Lord President.—In this case I agree with the Sheriff-substitute. I do not think there is a relevant averment of fault. The pursuer is a carter,

* "Note.— . . . The pursuer avers two things—that no warning was given that the crane was going to start working, and that the system of working was defective.

"There is no averment of negligence in working—only that the pursuer got no warning. I do not think such averment is sufficient. A crane is an essential part of the working of a quarry. He knew that the crane would work, and did work regularly. It is not said it was worked in any unusual manner, or that the man who worked it was inefficient or incompetent. He does not say that he did not understand the manner of working, or that he or his horse were new to the job. Nor does he say what kind of warning he ought to have got. All he says is he got none. This case, to my mind, falls under the category of risks incidental to the employment. No quarry can be properly carried on without cranes. He knew that cranes were and must be used, and it seems to me rather unreasonable to expect a master to shout, 'Look out,' every time he is going to perform a usual and ordinarily harmless function incidental to his business. There are certain occupations which involve a certain amount of risk, and I think this is one of them. . . ."

the ordinary course of whose business was to take a bogie to the defenders' quarries for the precise purpose of conveying stones from them to the railway. It must be presumed that he was perfectly conversant with the class of noises he would meet with at the quarry. There is nothing said against the defenders, who were strangers to the pursuer, but that the defenders' servants ought to have warned pursuer of the craneman's intention to work the crane, which they did not do. That is not an averment of fault at all. A very sensible view of the case is taken by the Sheriff-substitute in his note, and although from the Sheriff's note we see that further averments were made by way of amendment to meet the criticisms passed on the record by the Sheriff-substitute, I do not think they have been successful in doing so. If this case were allowed to go to trial I do not see what case would not. Any person who was standing at a shop with a horse which was alarmed by a sudden noise from the shop would, in the pursuer's view, have a good action against the shopkeeper. It seems to me that this was just one of those risks which a person looking after a horse was bound to provide against for himself. I think there is here no relevant case, and that the action should be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree with your Lordship, and with the result at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived, and the general grounds of his opinion, although I do not agree with all that he has said. We have nothing to do here with common employment or the responsibility of a master to his servant for the safety of his system of working. This is not an action at the instance of a workman in the service of the defender, but of a stranger. For the reasons your Lordship has given I think this case is irrelevant, and should be dismissed.

1ST DIVISION.

MRS MARY M'CABE OR KELLY, widow of John Kelly, labourer, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against James Fraser & Company, Glasgow, in which she craved decree for £180, 1s., as due to her by the defenders under the Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), in respect of the death of her husband. The action originally also contained a claim for damages at common law, but this was withdrawn when the case was before the Sheriff (Guthrie).

By interlocutor, dated 17th November 1904, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) allowed a proof before answer quoad the claim under the Employers Liability Act; and on appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie), by interlocutor, dated 14th January 1905, adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and proposed an issue for the trial of the cause by jury.

Counsel for the defenders maintained that the appeal was incompetent, and argued;—An appeal under the Judicature Act, section 40, and the Court of Session Act, 1868, section 73, was not competent in a case brought under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. No doubt a different view was expressed by the Judges in the case of Paton v. Niddrie & Benhar Coal Company, Limited.[1] But that decision was not well founded, and had been questioned,[2] and ought now to be reconsidered. By the Employers Liability Act, 1880, a new right was conferred which was to be vindicated in the Sheriff Court only with a limited right of removal to the Court of Session subject to certain conditions. Where a new right was given, and the method of vindicating it was prescribed, that by implication was the only method authorised. An action brought under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, could therefore only be removed to the Court of Session under section 6 (3) of the Act (Employers Liability Act), in the way and subject to the conditions prescribed by section 9 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1877. The intention of the Legislature was to obviate the hardship to employers of being put to the expense of litigating in the Court of Session against an impecunious pursuer in cases which might properly have been tried in the Sheriff Court. In an appeal under the Judicature Act, if £25 were recovered, the pursuer was entitled to full expenses.[3] There was no object in imposing the condition as to expenses when the case was removed before, or immediately after, the closing of the record, if appeal without any such condition was competent after proof was allowed. This was not a class of case in which any hardship could arise from overruling a previous decision of the Court, and the present case should, if necessary, be sent to a fuller bench in order that the case of Paton[1] might be reconsidered. That case, however, was not directly in point here, because the action there was laid at common law as well as under the Employers Liability Act. Counsel also referred to M'Avoy v. Young's Paraffin Company, Limited.[4]

Counsel for the pursuer and appellant were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I think we have no alternative except to follow Paton.[1] That case is not distinguishable from the present. Although there was this difference that the action there was laid at common law as well as under the Employers Liability Act, 1880,[5] the only objection taken was because the case had been removed to the Court of Session under the Judicature Act[1] instead of under the Employers Liability Act, 1880,[2] sec. 6 (3), and to that point only the opinions of the Judges were directed. That decision is absolutely binding upon us. I do not say whether it was right or wrong, but I see no reason to doubt that it was right.

It has been brought to our notice that doubts as to the soundness of the decision in Paton[3] have been expressed in the Second Division. But although such doubts were expressed the Judges said they were bound to follow it. If the question is to be sent to a larger Court it must come from the Division where doubts as to Paton's case[3] have arisen, and not from that in which no doubt has yet been felt as to the soundness of that decision.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree with your Lordship. We have no choice but to follow Paton.[3] I have not as yet seen reason to doubt the soundness of that decision. But at all events it is a decision binding upon us.

LORD PEARSON.—I agree for the reasons which your Lordship has assigned.

The trial of the action was postponed in July 1904, owing to the inability of the pursuer from ill-health to attend at the trial for examination as a witness. The case was again set down for trial at the Spring Sittings in 1905.

The pursuer moved for a commission to take the pursuer's evidence, and produced a medical certificate which stated that the pursuer was not in a fit state of health to attend the trial, that it was impossible to state when he would be able to do so, but that there was little prospect of his being able to do so within the next twelve months. The defender asked that the trial should be again postponed. The Court refused to postpone the trial again, and granted the pursuer's motion.

by the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) on 30th October 1903. The case was set down for trial at the Summer Sittings in 1904. In July 1904, counsel for the pursuer moved for a commission to take the evidence of the pursuer, and produced a medical certificate to the effect that the pursuer was suffering from complete mental breakdown, the result of worry and sleeplessness, and was unable to proceed to Edinburgh for examination as a witness. Counsel for the defender moved that the trial should be postponed. The Court refused to allow the pursuer's evidence to be taken on commission, and postponed the trial.

The case was again set down for trial at the Spring Sittings in 1905. On 11th March counsel for the pursuer moved for a commission to take the pursuer's evidence at Inverness, and produced a medical certificate in these terms:—"Inverness, March 8th, 1905.—I hereby certify, on soul and conscience, that Mr James Anderson, contractor, Eastgate, Inverness, is not in a fit state of health to attend the trial in Edinburgh of the action at his instance against Mr Donald Morrison. I cannot state when he will be able to do so, but there is little prospect of his being able to attend trial in Edinburgh within the next twelve months. I am, however, of opinion that his evidence might be taken on commission before a commissioner in this town, and that the adoption of that course would cause his health less injury."

The defender moved that the trial should be postponed.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was little prospect of the pursuer, who was still suffering from nervous breakdown, being able to come to Edinburgh for examination at a trial. The trial had been postponed before, and to insist upon the pursuer's attendance as a condition of the trial going on would amount in the circumstances to a complete denial of justice.

Argued for the defender;—The defender was entitled to have the pursuer present for examination at the trial. This was essential to a proper trial of the cause. If the pursuer was unable to attend, the proper course was to postpone the trial until he was able to do so.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is a peculiar situation disclosed here, and I think it is clearly a case to allow the motion; indeed, to do otherwise would be tantamount to saying that the pursuer should have no action for the injury alleged to have been done him simply because he has never since been in a sufficiently good state of health to appear in the witness-box. It seems to me that any prejudice arising from his not being here will have to be borne by himself. It might be very desirable to postpone the trial so as to have the pursuer in the witness-box, if there were some prospect of his being able to attend; but seeing the date when the act complained of was done, and that the pursuer has been ill ever since, it does not seem to me that there should be any further delay.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree. I take it to be practically conceded that the pursuer cannot be compelled to appear for examination at the trial, for the defender's motion is, not that the action should be dismissed, but only that the trial should be postponed. I do not think that a proper course, considering the length of time for which the action has been already in Court; and if it is not to be thrown out at once, which is not suggested, the only alternative is that the trial should be allowed to proceed, leaving the pursuer's evidence, if he desires to tender himself as a witness, to be taken on commission. The prejudice which may arise from proceeding at a time when the pursuer cannot go into the witness-box will fall upon himself rather than upon his opponent.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN April 1901 D. Y. Stewart & Co., ironfounders, St Rollox, Glasgow, accepted an offer of Messrs Croom & Arthur, engineers, Glasgow, to fit up two mechanical stokers in their St Rollox Works. The conditions of the offer, so far as material to the present case, were contained in a letter by Croom & Arthur, dated 6th February 1901, from which the following is an excerpt:—"We have now pleasure, as requested by your Mr Bowser, in offering to fit up our improved mechanical stoker, delivered and erected, the buyer supplying rough labour and doing any brickwork, for the sum of £85 (eighty-five pounds) per boiler. We guarantee to prevent smoke to the satisfaction of the inspector before receiving payment."

The stokers were fitted in July or August 1901, and were thereafter used by D. Y. Stewart & Co. in their works. After complaints as to the working of the stokers, D. Y. Stewart & Co., in answer to a demand for payment, wrote to the agent for Messrs Croom & Arthur the following letter, dated 11th September 1902:—"Dear Sirs,—Your letter of 11th inst. is before us, and we must say we are greatly surprised at its contents. The mechanical stokers do not fulfil the conditions held out, and if they did, we could not accept them as satisfactory. right. But we have already told Mr Arthur to arrange for their removal, and that if he does not we shall do so, and be compelled to consider what claim we shall have to make for the very many expenses he has put us to."

On 26th September 1902 D. Y. Stewart & Co. wrote to Croom & Arthur in the following terms:—"Dear Sirs,—We shall be compelled, in the course of a day or so, to take action in regard to the mechanical stokers supplied by you. As you are already aware, we have been put to enormous cost in the delay in installing the stokers, in the assistance rendered by us in fitting up the stokers, in the innumerable mechanical defects and the continual alterations to the furnace, and, ultimately, in the erection of the chimney to suit your stokers, and otherwise. We now confirm that the stokers must be removed, and we hereby call upon you to arrange for this being done, as we must have our arrangements completed in time for necessary alterations to be made at the New Year holidays."

To this letter Messrs Croom & Arthur did not reply.

D. Y. Stewart & Co. continued to use the stokers until the end of 1902, when they were removed during the New Year holidays.

Meanwhile, on 31st October 1902 Messrs Croom & Arthur had brought the present action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against D. Y. Stewart & Co., concluding for payment of £170, being the price of the two mechanical stokers.

The defenders, in addition to defences founded on alleged delay in fitting up the stokers, made the following averment:—"Explained that said stokers were not fitted up till the month of August 1901, and that when fitted up they were defective and did not prevent smoke to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector. In consequence of the delay and failure to prevent smoke as provided for, the defenders suffered loss and damage greatly in excess of the sum sued for, which loss and damage they plead in extinction of the price of said stokers, and reserve all claims competent to them to sue the pursuers for the balance of the loss they sustained through the pursuers' breach of contract." In explanation of their use of the stokers after September 1902 (which was admitted) the defenders averred:—"Explained that the defenders had no alternative but to use the stokers, in respect they required to enter into other contracts for the purpose of obtaining substitutes therefor, and also to keep their machinery and workmen employed until such time as they could have the stokers in question replaced. Had the defenders not so used the stokers, the damage claimed by them would have been greatly increased. Explained, further, that they never accepted the stokers as conform to contract, and all along intimated that they would not accept them as conform to contract."

The pursuers averred that the failure of the stokers to prevent smoke to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector was due to the actings and workings of the defenders, and not to the stokers being inefficient for the purpose for which they were originally supplied.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders are barred personali exceptione, and by mora, from maintaining their defences. (3) The defences are irrelevant and incompetent.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers, having contracted to supply stokers which would prevent smoke to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector, and they having failed to implement their contract, are not entitled to payment of the price. (2) The stokers supplied by the pursuers being disconform to warranty, and the defenders having suffered loss and damage thereby, are entitled to set off the loss and damage so sustained against the pursuer's claim. (3) The pursuers having failed to deliver and fit up the stokers at the time contracted for, and the defenders having suffered loss and damage thereby, the defenders are entitled to plead said loss and damage against the pursuers' claim. (4) The pursuers having contracted with the defenders to supply and fit up stokers which would save fuel, and they having failed to do so, the defenders are entitled to set up the loss and damage they have sustained through such failure.*

Proof was allowed and led. The evidence on the question whether the stokers had been properly used was conflicting. Quoad ultra the facts appear from the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

On 29th November 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact, that by letters between the parties the pursuers contracted to supply and fit up two of their mechanical stokers to two of the defenders' boilers for the sum of £85 each, the defenders to erect the engine and overhead shafting, and the brickwork and rough labour, the pursuers guaranteeing to prevent black smoke to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector; (2) that the pursuers did supply and fit up the stokers in August 1901, and the defenders used them till the end of 1902; (3) that after their erection the sanitary inspector still complained of black smoke from the defenders' works, but that this was caused, not by defective construction of the stokers, but by improper use of them by the defenders; (4) that the defenders removed the stokers in the end of 1902, and now refuse to pay for them: Finds in law that they are bound to pay for them: Therefore decerns as craved."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—On the facts it was proved that the stokers were not conform to contract. It was an express condition precedent to the right to payment that the stokers should prevent smoke, to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector. That condition had not been fulfilled, and therefore the pursuers had no right to payment. That distinguished the case from Electric Construction Company, Limited, v. Hurry & Young,[1] where there was only a warranty, not a condition precedent to payment. Alternatively the rejection was timeously completed. Machinery of the nature of mechanical stokers could not be taken out without stopping the furnace, and therefore rejection was in time if made as soon as a holiday rendered it possible. The decision in Electric Construction Company[1] did not amount to a rule that a purchaser must throw a defective machine out of his works the moment he decided to reject it, regardless of the amount of damage that course would cause. If that was the import of the case it should be reconsidered.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—(After an argument on the import of the evidence, directed to shew that the failure of the stokers was due to the defenders' actings)—The defenders had failed to distinguish Electric Construction Co., Limited, v. Hurry & Young.[1] That case was authoritative, and had been followed.[2] There was no substantial difference between a condition precedent to payment and a warranty forming a material part of the contract. In both cases, if the condition or the warranty were not fulfilled, the purchaser had the alternative remedies of rejecting the goods, and treating the contract as rescinded, or keeping the goods and claiming damages.[3] What the authorities already cited established was that he must select his remedy, which in the present case he had failed to do. The undernoted case was also cited.[4]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The evidence in this case is conflicting, and by no means satisfactory. I do not think it necessary to go into it in detail, and perhaps there are some points in which the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor may be open to criticism. But in the main I agree with his view that the failure of the mechanical stokers supplied by the pursuers was due not to inherent defects in the design, but to their not having been properly used by the defenders. It is one particular feature in the case that the building work in connection with the fitting in of the stokers was not to be executed by the pursuers, but that the brickwork and the labour connected with it were to be supplied by the defenders themselves, and from the evidence I think it appears that a good deal of the difficulty in obtaining satisfactory working was caused by their mismanagement. Thus one of the most serious difficulties arose in the working of the ram by which the feed of fuel was controlled, and this it is shewn was caused by the setting of the brickwork. This was, of course, of the very utmost importance, as anything that impeded the proper working of the mechanical feed would necessarily be a serious interference with efficiency.

Then, again, what is called the coking arch forms a most important part of the arrangement for securing a satisfactory operation of the furnace. For its purpose was to cause any unconsumed fuel to pass for some distance nearly horizontally over the furnace bed, and thereby expose it to the high temperature which would cause combustion. If the coking arch was defective, the tendency of the smoke would be to rise clear of the heating surface whenever it formed, and this would plainly have two results for evil. Some of it would be caught and lodged on the water tubes, thus diminishing the value of the heating surface, and what was not caught would ascend as wasted fuel, and escape by the chimney in breach of the smoke prevention bye-laws. Yet, on my reading of the evidence, I am satisfied with the Sheriff-substitute's view that this arch, which of course required to be constructed to the specification of the pursuers, was taken down in July 1902, without the pursuers' knowledge and consent, and the defenders thereafter kept the stokers and used them for another six months.

Croom & Arthur v. Stewart & Co.

I therefore agree with the Sheriff-substitute in his first view of the case, that the stokers did not get such fair play in the hands of the defenders as would entitle them to reject the stokers, even had they done so earlier than they did.

But even if it could be held that this was not a sound view of the evidence of fact, I should still feel compelled to hold that the defence put forward must fail. For I am unable to see any answer to the pursuers' contention that the defenders by retaining the stokers and continuing to use them for a long period after they maintain that they rejected them, have altered their legal position. To me it appears quite certain that the decision in the case of the Electric Construction Company,[1] quoted at the debate, is directly applicable to this case, and that as a consequence the defenders cannot now, on the footing that they have retained the goods, claim damages. Their case must be either that they rejected, which they say they did, and therefore are not liable in payment of the price, or that they retained subject to a claim of damages. But if they rejected, as they say they did, in September 1902, then under the case I have referred to they cannot claim damages.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I agree with the Sheriff that the contract between the parties contained a condition or warranty to the effect that the pursuers' apparatus should prevent smoke to the satisfaction of the Glasgow authorities. I also agree with him that this warranty was not fulfilled. I differ from him, however, when he proceeds to find that the failure of the apparatus "was caused not by defective construction of the stokers but by improper use of them by the defenders." As to that I should be of opinion, having done my best to weigh the somewhat unsatisfactory evidence on the subject, that the pursuers have failed to prove that the defenders used the stokers improperly, or that thus or otherwise the non-fulfilment of the condition or warranty was due to their (the defenders') default.

But while so holding, and my conclusion being so far in favour of the defenders, it has still to be considered what was the effect in law of the defenders' continued use of the stokers down to the end of the year 1902—a fact as to which there is no dispute; and as to that I am obliged to say that I cannot distinguish the present case from that of the Electric Construction Company,[1] decided by the First Division of the Court in 1897—a decision to which the Sheriff refers, and to which the pursuers appeal. I am not sure that I quite follow the reasoning by which in that case the majority of the Court reached the conclusion that the alternative remedy provided by the Sale of Goods Act of 1893 was barred to the defenders by their previous ineffective rejection. But not being in the circumstances prepared to propose to your Lordships that the point of law there and here involved should be submitted to the whole Court, I consider that, as the two cases are not distinguishable, we ought to follow the decision referred to. In that view I am not prepared to dissent from the judgment which I understand your Lordships propose, viz., that we should affirm the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. I should have proposed, for the reasons I have explained, that in place of the second paragraph of the Sheriff's third finding in fact, which is I think not well founded, there should be substituted a finding to the effect that the pursuers have failed to establish that the sanitary inspector's complaint was due to any improper working or other default of the defenders, while on the other hand we should alter the finding in law so as to read,—"Finds, however, in law that inasmuch as after intimating their rejection of the pursuers' apparatus in September 1902 the defenders continued to use the same until the end of 1902, they (the defenders) are barred from claiming damages in respect of the apparatus being disconform to contract." But agreeing with the Sheriff-substitute's result I do not think it necessary to dissent from the judgment which your Lordships propose.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK intimated that LORD YOUNG, who was absent at the advising, concurred in the judgment proposed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY, not having been present at the hearing, gave no opinion.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and found in fact and in law in terms of the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 29th November 1904.

MRS MARGARET M'DONALD OR MITCHELL, Petitioner.—Dewar, K.C.—J. Macdonald.
ELIZABETH WRIGHT, Respondent.—A. M. Anderson.

Parent and Child—Custody—Illegitimate Child—Right of mother or her nominee to custody—Petition for custody refused—Custody of Children Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 3), sections 1 and 3.—Circumstances in which a petition by a mother for the custody of her illegitimate child, whom she had entrusted more than seven years before to the care of her cousin, refused, on the ground that it was not for the best interests of the child to deliver it to the petitioner or her nominee.

Observations by the Lord President upon sections 1 and 3 of the Custody of Children Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 3).

1ST DIVISION. ON 17th December 1904 Mrs Margaret M'Donald or Mitchell, wife of and residing with John Mitchell, labourer, 4 Niddry Street, Edinburgh, presented a petition, with the consent and concurrence of her husband, for the custody of her illegitimate female child, Elizabeth Aitken.

The petitioner averred that the child was born on 2d June 1897, while she herself was in service at Avontoun House, Linlithgow, that on 2d July 1897 she placed the child in the custody of Mr and Mrs Cunningham, Maddiston, Polmont Station, Stirlingshire, where it remained till July 1904, that in July 1904 the child was at the request of Miss Elizabeth Wright, housekeeper at Avontoun House, sent to reside with her during the holidays; and that Miss Wright had refused to return the child to the Cunninghams, or to give her up to the petitioner.

Mitchell v. Wright.

The petitioner accordingly craved the Court to find that she was entitled to the custody of the child; and "to ordain the said Miss Elizabeth Wright to deliver up the said child to the petitioner, or to those having her authority . . . to remain in the custody of the petitioner."

Answers were lodged by Miss Wright, in which she narrated the facts as to the child's maintenance and upbringing substantially as they are set forth in the report by the Sheriff of the Lothians,* and averred:—"The respondent is attached to the child, and the child is happy and contented with the respondent. The respondent is in a position to give the child a comfortable home and a good education, and has the intention of doing so. The petitioner is not in a position to attend to the child. It is believed that she is employed in the daytime in a boot factory, and that she is unable to employ any person to look after the child in her absence. The respondent refers to and founds upon the Custody of Children Act, 1891, particularly sections 1 and 3 thereof, and maintains (1) that in the interests of the child the petition ought to be dismissed; and (2) that the said James Cunningham, as dominus litis, ought to be found liable to the respondent in expenses."

On 21st January 1905 the Court remitted to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles to inquire into the facts and circumstances of the case set forth in the petition and answers, and to report.*

* The report of the Sheriff (Maconochie, K.C.) was as follows:—" . . . The petitioner, Margaret M'Donald or Mitchell (aged 34), is a cousin of the respondent, Miss Elizabeth Wright, who has been for upwards of twenty years housekeeper to Mr Henry T. Blair of Avontoun House, Linlithgowshire.

"In 1897 the petitioner, who was then unmarried, had been for about eight years a domestic servant at Avontoun. On 2d June of that year she gave birth to the illegitimate child Elizabeth Aitken. On the day of the birth the respondent went to a law-agent in Linlithgow and arranged for proceedings being taken against George Aitken, the putative father, with a view to obtaining decree of aliment against him, and on 2d July 1897 decree was granted against him ordaining him, inter alia, to pay aliment for twelve years at the rate of £6, 10s. per annum paid quarterly.

"Immediately after the birth the respondent and a Mrs Roy, daughter of James Cunningham, Maddiston, Polmont Station, retired mineral worker, and now sergeant in the Salvation Army, went with the consent of the petitioner to see Cunningham, and arranged that he and his wife should receive the child into their house and bring it up, they being paid a sum monthly for its maintenance. About a month afterwards the arrangement was carried out, the child being taken to the Cunninghams by Miss Wright and Mrs Roy.

"The petitioner remained in service at Avontoun till November 1901, and during that time she used frequently to go to see the child.

"When she left Avontoun she went to live with a man Thomas Mackay, who shortly afterwards went as a soldier to the war in South Africa. . . .

"In January 1902, after Mackay had gone away, the petitioner went to Cunningham's house and demanded that her child should be delivered to her. Cunningham refused to give her up, and the petitioner went away. Since then, and until this petition was about to be raised, she has not tried to see the child, has paid nothing towards its upkeep, and has not shewn in any way that she takes any interest in it.

"On February 28th 1902 the petitioner wrote to Messrs P. & P. Miller, solicitors, Linlithgow, who act for the respondent, saying that she would Argued for the petitioner;—The mother's right to the custody of her child was inalienable, and the agreement made with Miss Wright was therefore not binding on the petitioner.[1] Nothing had been said against the petitioner's character, but looking to the Sheriff's report as to the locality in which the petitioner was residing, she could not maintain that her present residence was a suitable home for the child. The petitioner accordingly now asked the Court to send the child back to the care of the Cunninghams. [LORD PRESIDENT.—The remit to the reporter was not made on the basis which is now proposed; the inquiry ordered was on the footing that the petitioner should have the custody, not on the footing that the Cunninghams should have it. What the petitioner now asks the Court to do is to give the custody of her child to a nominee of her own, who might give it back to her within a week.] The mother of an illegitimate child was entitled to name the person with whom her child should allow the child to remain with the Cunninghams, and that she was sure that Miss Wright would see 'that the child is taken care of, also that it is fed and clothed.'

"In April 1902 the petitioner entered into a formal agreement with the respondent (No. 6 of process), under which the former bound herself, inter alia, to allow the child 'to remain as hitherto under the custody of Miss Wright either at Avontoun or elsewhere in the discretion of' Miss Wright.

"In July 1904 the respondent took the child to stay with her at Avontoun during the school holidays, and subsequently refused to allow the Cunninghams to take her back to their house. The child is still at Avontoun, and there is in process a letter from Mr Blair to Mr Miller, in which he states that he quite approves of her remaining an inmate of his house, and that he will 'always be very willing to give Miss Wright any pecuniary aid she may require for the purpose of supplying the child with suitable clothing,' &c.

"In August 1904 the petitioner married her present husband, and is now living with him at No. 4 Niddry Street, Edinburgh.

"So far the facts are not in dispute, but there are two subjects on which, though perhaps they are not of great importance to the decision of the case, it is proper that I should say a few words, as averments with regard to them are made on record and evidence relating to them was led.

"1. Who has paid for the maintenance of the child from its birth to the present time? The evidence with regard to this matter is very contradictory, but after giving it my best consideration, it is, I think, proved (1) that the respondent provided out of her own means at least the greater part of the baby clothes at the time of the birth; (2) that she so paid the whole expense of the action of filiation; (3) that whenever Aitken has failed to pay the whole sum due by him under the decree (and such occasions have been very frequent), the respondent has made up the sum to 10s. monthly. The Cunninghams were to receive £1 per month, and I incline to the opinion that she also paid part of the 10s. a month which the petitioner says she paid up to November 1901. As, however, there are no receipts of any kind produced it is impossible to be certain on this point; (4) that in July 1903 the respondent paid to Cunningham a sum of £9 (being, so far as I can make out, the arrears then due to him), and I see no reason to disbelieve her when she says that all that sum came out of her own pocket, with the exception of a few small sums which were handed to her by Mr Miller as coming from Aitken; (5) Miss Wright says that she paid to Cunningham on another occasion a lump sum of £14. This Cunningham reside. The child had been well treated by the Cunninghams, and she had been removed from their custody without the consent of the petitioner. Under the Custody of Children Act, 1891, the Court could not deprive the petitioner of the custody of her child unless she had (a) abandoned or deserted it, or (b) allowed it to be brought up by another person at that person's expense.* The petitioner had not abandoned or deserted her child, and she had contributed towards its maintenance.

Argued for the respondent;—Under the agreement made with the petitioner in 1902 Miss Wright was entitled to the custody of the child as far as the Cunninghams were concerned, and she had done nothing illegal in taking the child to live with herself. The welfare of the child was the main consideration, both at common law and under the statute.[1] It was clear from the Sheriff's report, and from the admission now made by the petitioner's counsel, that she was not denies, and in the absence of receipts I cannot arrive at any conclusion on the matter; (6) that since November 1901 the petitioner has paid nothing for the child. It is right, however, to say that she and the Cunninghams swear that when she visited them in January 1902 she offered some payment, but that she was told by Cunningham that he did not wish to receive any further payments either from her or anyone else. On the other hand, as I have said, it is admitted that the Cunninghams accepted a payment of £9 from Miss Wright in July 1903.

"2. With regard to the agreement entered into in 1902: The document speaks for itself, and I would only add that Mr Miller, solicitor, swears that he explained its whole terms to the petitioner, and that it was sent to her for signature, so that, if the document is of any importance at all, it cannot be said that the petitioner signed it without full knowledge of what it contained or acting under any undue influence.

"I saw and spoke to the child in private. In appearance she struck me as looking very delicate, being white and thin, with particularly thin hands. She answered all my questions readily, and altogether she struck me as being decidedly above the average for her years in intelligence. She readily admitted that she had been well treated when living with the Cunninghams, but there can be no doubt that (if her views are of any importance) she is strongly attached to the respondent (whom she calls 'auntie'), and is very anxious to live with her. She evidently is afraid of going to live with her mother, of whom she says, with truth, that she knows nothing. A certificate from Dr James Hunter, M.D., is produced. It is not stated to be on soul and conscience, but it is admittedly genuine, and in an inquiry of this kind I think that I am entitled to receive it, and it is now in process. His opinion does not seem to be based on any prolonged and intimate acquaintance with the child's constitution, but so far as I could gather there is no other doctor to whom she is better known to whom I could apply for an opinion. It is right to add that the Cunninghams said that until the child was about three years old she was delicate, but that since she began to go to school she has not been absent at all on the ground of ill-health, but from what I saw myself (and I am strengthened in my opinion by Dr Hunter's certificate), I think that plenty of fresh air in a position to give her child a suitable home. The alternative motion now made, to send the child to the Cunninghams, was obviously an afterthought. At the inquiry the petitioner stated on oath that she intended to retain the child in her own custody. If the motion was granted, the Cunninghams might at once hand the child over to the petitioner. The child was being well cared for, and was happy and contented where she was, and the petition should be refused.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of Mrs Margaret Mitchell, the mother of an illegitimate female child, which is presented in order to obtain custody of the child, who is now and has been for some time residing with Elizabeth Wright at Avontoun House, Linlithgow. Miss Wright is a cousin of the petitioner.

Your Lordships remitted to the Sheriff of the Lothians to inquire into the

and good nourishment are necessary for her health. These things there can be no doubt she would get at Avontoun.

"With regard to the home to which the petitioner says that she is anxious to take the child, I have to report that up to the middle of the first week in February the petitioner was working in a boot factory, for the few days between that date and the inquiry she had ceased to go out to work. She gave no explanation as to why it was necessary for her to work since her marriage until February, and as to why it is unnecessary for her to do so now. She states that she is not pregnant. Her husband is a mason's labourer, and earns 23s. a week when he is working. He does not seem to be a regular worker, and he is known to the inspectors of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children as a man who is addicted to loafing about the street during working hours. The petitioner was respectably dressed when she attended the inquiry, and there is no evidence suggesting that her present character is bad or even doubtful.

"The house in which the petitioner and her husband live is on the top storey of a common stair, and consists of one room, measuring about 13 feet by 9 feet. That size of room is, it should be stated, certified as satisfying the requirements of the sanitary authorities as a dwelling-place for three persons. The Cunninghams, who are respectable enough looking people, swear that the room is clean looking and well furnished, and Cunningham says that once or twice he got his tea there comfortably. On the other hand, Mr Turnbull, who is a very experienced inspector of the above named Society, deponed that the room is very poorly furnished, with only one bed in it, and that it is, in his opinion, unsuitable as a place in which to bring up a child. That the stair is dark, and that the neighbours are not of a desirable class (the petitioner also admitted that the stair is 'pretty rowdy'). He would not go so far as to say that if he had found a child living there with its own father and mother he would have thought it his duty at once to bring the case under the notice of the society. Mr Picken, the other inspector, who was examined, and who knows the petitioner's husband well, while agreeing with Mr Turnbull in his evidence generally went somewhat further, stating that he found the bedding dirty, and that had he found a child living there even with its own father and mother he would have reported the case with a view to its removal from the parents' custody. This matter seemed to me so important that after reading over my notes I asked Mr Turnbull to come to me privately with a view to supplementing his evidence on the point. He then told me (being still under oath) that the inhabitants of the stair are a very drunken and low lot, and that his society has had a great number of cases of child neglect under consideration from the house. The stair itself is very long, dark and ill ventilated, and it has a bad reputation for assaults, indecent and otherwise, on young girls, facts and circumstances set forth in the petition and answers, and we have now before us a very full and careful report by the Sheriff.

It appears from the report that the petitioner gave birth to this illegitimate child while in service at Avontoun House in the year 1897. The respondent, who was then housekeeper at Avontoun House, came to the assistance of the petitioner, and made arrangements for the upbringing of the child. She also arranged for proceedings being taken against the father of the child, and a decree for aliment was obtained against him, which he has somewhat intermittently implemented.

The petitioner was not in a position to look after the child herself when it was born, nor at that time was the respondent able to do so, because she was housekeeper in a gentleman's house, and could make no provision for taking in a child of tender years. Accordingly the respondent arranged that the child should be boarded with a Mr and Mrs Cunningham. The child remained with them till July 1904, and they were paid for her maintenance. The payments were made pro tanto out of such funds as were received from the child's father, and the balance was supplemented by the respondent. About a year ago the respondent saw her way, with the consent of her master, to take the child into residence with herself, and the child has since remained with the respondent at Avontoun House.

The petitioner, after a somewhat troubled career, is now married to a man in humble circumstances, but of respectable character. He is not in steady employment, nor does he seem likely to be able to provide a settled home for the child, and counsel for the petitioner eventually admitted that it was out of the question to send the child to the present home of her mother and stepfather.

The respondent objects to giving up the child, and the Sheriff has no difficulty in assuring us that the child would much rather remain where she is.

The petition is presented on the ground that the petitioner, as the mother of the child, has the right to her custody. She at first proposed to take the taking place there. There is little furniture in the house, only one bed, and generally the room is dirty. The father's reputation is not good so far as sobriety is concerned, beyond that the witness could not speak to his character.

"The last matter on which I think it necessary to say anything is with regard to the averment that James Cunningham is the true dominus litis. I do not think that that is proved, though it is evident that he is doing all in his power to assist the petitioner. I am by no means certain that there is not some understanding between him and the petitioner to the effect that in the event of the petitioner obtaining the custody of her child it will be handed over by her to his charge. Cunningham prevaricated and would not give a distinct answer to a question to that effect put by me, and the impression left on my mind was that there was some such understanding. The petitioner, however, swore quite distinctly that it was her intention to retain the child in her own custody, and I venture to think that the case must be decided on that footing.

"I think it right to add that the petitioner never said a word to suggest that it was from any feeling of maternal affection to the child that she was suing for its custody. She gave no explanation of why she had deserted the child in 1901, and she would say nothing as to what measures she was prepared to take for having the child attended to if she were in the future compelled to go out to work."

child into her own custody, and swore at the inquiry before the Sheriff that such was her intention. But counsel for the petitioner has so far changed her attitude that he now admits that it is impossible to ask for an order for custody by the petitioner, and he asks for an order to retransfer the child to the Cunninghams.

I think it is extremely inadvisable that a change of front of this magnitude should be made in the course of the hearing of a petition for custody, and, in view of the Sheriff's statement, I do not think it is safe to take the facts except as they are presented in the case. There is no security that an order to transfer the child to the Cunninghams might not be disregarded within a few days, and the child taken away by her mother, and therefore I am not disposed to give much heed to this sudden change of front in the course of the petition.

The petitioner has, however, directly raised the question of the powers of the Court under the Custody of Children Act, 1891.[1] The two sections which apply to the present case are the first and third. Section 1 enacts:—"Where the parent of a child applies to the High Court or the Court of Session for a writ or order for the production of the child, and the Court is of opinion that the parent has abandoned or deserted the child, or that he has otherwise so conducted himself that the Court should refuse to enforce his right to the custody of the child, the Court may in its discretion decline to issue the writ or make the order."

I do not think the facts in this case amount to abandonment or desertion. I think that the words "abandoned or deserted the child" point at the parent leaving the child to its fate. But in this case, although the petitioner did little for her child, she never really abandoned or deserted it, because she knew and approved of the steps which the respondent took for its maintenance.

But then the latter portion of section 1 raises a more delicate question. The words "has otherwise so conducted himself that the Court should refuse to enforce his right to the custody of the child," seem to point to some defect in the character of the parent which would render him unfit to bring up the child. The findings of the Sheriff do not establish any moral fault in the petitioner's mode of life at the present time, but they come to this, that she is not in a position to give the child a home in which it can have any great advantages for its maintenance or development.

Section 3 enacts,—"Where a parent has (a) abandoned or deserted his child, or (b) allowed his child to be brought up by another person at that person's expense, or by the guardians of a poor-law union, for such length of time and under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court that the parent was unmindful of his parental duties, the Court shall not make an order for the delivery of the child to the parent, unless the parent has satisfied the Court that, having regard to the welfare of the child, he is a fit person to have the custody of the child."

The same observations apply to subsection (a) as to the first part of section 1. The petitioner's counsel, however, argued that this case was not within the terms of subsection (b) because the child had not been brought up by or at the expense of the respondent. I am of opinion that this is too narrow a reading of the words. I do not read them as meaning that the child must reside continuously in the home of the person who brings it up. I think they apply to the person who makes the arrangements for the board, lodging, and clothing of the child. In the same way the words "at that person's expense" do not mean that every penny of expense is to be paid by the person in question. The true meaning is the common sense meaning, and I think the words apply to the person who practically sees to the bringing up of the child.

Applying that meaning to the present case, I have no doubt that the respondent is the person who brought up the child at her expense. I have no doubt also that the facts of this case fortify that construction. It is evident that the mother practically washed her hands of the child, and left her entirely in the care of Miss Wright. That view is strengthened by the change of attitude adopted by her counsel to-day, which suggests that the present application is really made at the instigation of the Cunninghams.

With regard to the latter part of the section, it was argued that, in so far as there was at the present moment no moral slur upon the character of the petitioner, she must necessarily be a fit person to have the custody of her child. But then the words "having regard to the welfare of the child" must be kept in view. In short all these considerations point to the fact that the question of fitness is one of circumstances and degree.

The petitioner's counsel tried to argue that to refuse the prayer of the petition was tantamount to refusing the right to a mother to settle her child where she preferred when she was not able to take it herself, but we are laying down no such rule. If the mother had come forward with the names of persons of exceptional character who were able to give the child the advantages which she at the present enjoys, we should have respected her claim, but I cannot look upon her decision in favour of the Cunninghams, made somewhat late in the day, as fulfilling these conditions.

Having regard to the welfare of the child, I am clearly of opinion that the case comes under the statute, and that it is for the welfare of the child to remain, as she wishes, with the respondent. I am therefore for refusing the prayer of the petition.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, with this qualification, that I desire to reserve my opinion as to the interpretation of the second part of section 1. But the third section, as to the construction of which I agree with your Lordship, is quite sufficient for the disposal of the case, in so far as it depends upon the statute; and I am satisfied, for the reasons your Lordship has stated, that this petition should be refused.

LORD DUNDAS.—The excellent and careful report of Sheriff Macconochie satisfies me that, having regard to the welfare of the child, and the whole circumstances of the case, and to the language of the statute of 1891, this is a petition which the Court ought not to grant but to refuse.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN were absent.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

2D DIVISION. ADAM BOYD BOYD of the Yett, Roxburghshire, was married to Miss Elizabeth Curry Hogue, daughter of Robert Hogue, Queen Street, Edinburgh, in 1860, the intended spouses having entered into the antenuptial contract of marriage after referred to.

Adam Boyd Boyd died on 8th January 1870, survived by his wife and by two children of the marriage—Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd, born 2d March 1866, and Ada Boyd Boyd, born 26th August 1867.

In 1893 Miss Ada Boyd Boyd was married to Thomas Arthur Randall Hutchinson, a domiciled Scotsman resident in Newcastle-on-Tyne. At the date of the special case after mentioned, two children were born of this marriage.

Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd died unmarried on 10th June 1902, leaving a last will and testament by which he appointed his brother-in-law Mr Hutchinson to be his sole executor, and bequeathed the residue of his estate to the two children of Mr and Mrs Hutchinson.

In January 1905 a special case was presented for the determination of questions that had arisen on the construction of the antenuptial marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Adam Boyd Boyd.

The first parties to the case were the antenuptial marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Adam Boyd Boyd.

The second party was Mrs Adam Boyd Boyd, the widow, who had not married again.

No. 105.

Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd.

The third party was Mr Hutchinson, as executor under the will of his brother-in-law Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd.

The fourth parties were the trustees under the antenuptial marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Hutchinson. By that deed Mrs Hutchinson, then Miss Ada Boyd Boyd, assigned, disponed, and made over to the trustees for the purposes therein mentioned the whole means and estate then belonging to her, and to which she should succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage.

I. The first question in the special case was, as to whether one-half of the fee of a sum of £5000 brought into his marriage-settlement by Mr Adam Boyd Boyd had vested in his son Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd, Robert having survived the dissolution of the marriage, but having been survived by his mother.

By the antenuptial marriage-contract, Adam Boyd Boyd bound himself to pay (and in fact duly paid) the sum of £5000 to the marriage-contract trustees for the purposes following:—"(First), That the said trustees shall receive, hold, and administer the said sum of Five thousand pounds in their own names, and pay or apply the full annual income or proceeds thereof as an alimentary fund to or for behoof of the family establishment to be created by the said spouses, excluding always the jus mariti or right of administration of the said Adam Boyd Boyd, in or over both the said principal sum and the annual income or proceeds thereof, which rights or claims he hereby specially renounces, and also excluding the claims of any creditors of the said spouses, or either of them, and declaring that the said principal sum and interest thereof shall not be assignable by them or either of them to the prejudice of this trust: And further, the said trustees and their foresaids shall have power, and are hereby empowered, either themselves to expend or apply, or else to pay over the said free income or proceeds thereof, to either of the spouses they may from time to time prefer, whose sole and separate receipt shall be their sufficient discharge. . . . (Second), That the said trustees and their foresaids shall continue to make such annual payments to or for the said spouses during the subsistence of the marriage, and to or for the survivor so long as he or she remains unmarried, but not longer: And upon the death or remarriage of the said survivor, the said principal sum, or the investments on which it stands, shall belong and be made over in equal sums to and among the children equally of the marriage between the said Adam Boyd Boyd and Elizabeth Curry Hogue: Declaring that the shares of any that may be pupils or minors at the time shall continue to be held and administered by the said trustees and their foresaids for their behoof until their majority, with power to the said trustees to make previous advances to them or for their behoof to the extent of one-third of their estimated shares, and in the event of the predecease of any of them before majority, their share shall descend and belong to their lawful issue, if any, equally, and failing issue shall then accresce and belong to their surviving brothers and sisters equally, the issue of any such having predeceased in like manner taking their parent's share. (Third), In the event of failure of issue of the present intended marriage, the principal of the said sum, or the investments on which it stands, shall, subject always to the liferent of the survivor, be at the disposal of the said spouses by joint deed or at their respective disposal by separate deeds, each to the extent of one-half thereof, and failing such disposal shall go and belong to the said Adam Boyd Boyd and his heirs or next of kin," which "provision above written, conceived in favour of the child or children who may be born of the said intended marriage, it is hereby declared shall be in full satisfaction to them of all bairn's part of gear, legitim, portion-natural, executry, and everything else that they could claim or demand by and through the decease of the said Adam Boyd Boyd, excepting what he may think fit to bestow of his own goodwill."

The third party maintained that one-half of the above-mentioned sum of £5000 vested in Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd, he having survived the dissolution of his parents' marriage: the fourth parties maintained that no right in the said sum could vest in any person till the death or remarriage of Mrs Adam Boyd Boyd, the surviving spouse.

II. The other question raised in the special case depended on the following further provision of Mr and Mrs Adam Boyd Boyd's marriage-contract:—"For which causes and on the other part the said Elizabeth Curry Hogue, with the consent of the said Robert Hogue, her father, hereby dispones, assigns, and makes over to the said trustees and their foresaids her whole means and estate, heritable or moveable, which she may acquire or succeed to by the death of her father, or by or from any other person or persons, to be held by them in trust—(First), For behoof of herself and her said intended husband, and the survivor of them, in liferent for their liferent use allenarly; and (Second), For behoof of the child or children of the marriage in fee, to be equally divided among them if more than one."

In January 1882, Mrs Boyd succeeded to £230 from Miss Wilson (who died in 1881), an aunt of Mrs Boyd, and in August 1889 to £1711 from Mr Wilson (who died in 1872), an uncle of Mrs Boyd. Both these sums were paid to Mr and Mrs Boyd's marriage-contract trustees.

With regard to these sums Mrs Boyd, the second party, maintained that as they came to her after the dissolution of her marriage they did not fall within the clause of assignation of acquirenda in her marriage-contract, and she called upon the marriage-contract trustees, the first parties, to pay them to her. The first parties maintained that these sums fell within the clause of acquirenda, and that they were bound to administer them as part of the marriage-contract funds. In this contention the third and fourth parties concurred.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was the estate inherited by Mrs Elizabeth Curry Hogue or Boyd Boyd from her aunt and uncle as aforesaid carried to the first parties under the clause of assignation of acquirenda in her marriage-contract? or, Does it fall to be paid to the second party free of the marriage-contract?"[1] Then followed two questions which, in view of the judgment of the Court, it is unnecessary here to set forth. "(4) Did one-half of the fee of the estate brought into the marriage-contract settlement by Adam Boyd Boyd vest in his son, the deceased Robert Hogue Boyd Boyd on his survival of the dissolution of the marriage between his parents?"[2]

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I see no reason for postponing vesting beyond the dissolution of the marriage and the majority of the respective children. I am of opinion that all the presumptions are in that direction, and that there is no particular difficulty upon the language of the settlement in giving effect to these presumptions.

There are several points in favour of vesting—(1) This is a marriage-contract in which the children's provisions are declared to be in full of legitim; (2) apart from the widow's liferent and the children's fee there is no ulterior destination or trust purpose, or at least no ulterior destination or trust purpose which is not plainly referable to failure of children before the dissolution of the marriage; and (3) even as between and among the children of the marriage there is no destination over except one expressly described as applicable to failure before majority.

On the other hand, there is absolutely no unfavourable point except this, that the gift of the fee is expressed as a gift to take effect at the death of the widow. And I am unable to hold that that is at all a conclusive circumstance or one which can be allowed to outweigh the other considerations to which I have just adverted.

As to that matter and the case generally, the decisions in Forbes[1] and Rogerson[2] are, I think, sufficient authorities. The latter was no doubt a case in which there was a dissent by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, but, on the other hand, it was a case very much more unfavourable than the present to vesting before payment. For there was there not only a gift expressed as here to take effect at the death of both spouses, but there was also what was at least capable of being read as a destination over to take effect as between the children failing survivance of both spouses.

I think therefore the fourth question in the case may be answered in the affirmative.

With regard to the first three questions, it appears to me that this case is within the principle of the cases of Wardlaw[3] and Campbell (Russell's Trustees),[4] and the other cases cited at the discussion, and that the first question falls to be answered in the affirmative in terms of its second alternative, and being so answered the second and third questions are superseded.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD YOUNG and LORD KINCAIRNEY were absent.

THE COURT answered the second alternative of the first question in the affirmative; answered the fourth question in the affirmative; and found it unnecessary to answer the other questions in the case.

Property—Right of Access—Servitude over property—Prescriptive Possession.—Before 1830 a self-contained house in Glasgow, bounded on the south by Bath Street, from which it entered, and on the west by Wellington Street, was divided into two houses, one containing the ground floor and the other the upper floor. An annex containing a stair to the upper floor was added to the north end of the house with a door to Wellington Street. In 1830 the proprietor conveyed the upper floor to A, "with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street," and in 1831 conveyed the remainder of the property to B. After the division of the property the stair was used solely by the proprietors of the upper storey. In 1904 X, who was in right of the property conveyed to B, brought a declarator that the staircase was his property, and that the proprietor of the upper storey, and successor in title to A, had no right to make structural alterations on it.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) granted decree, holding (1) that by the disposition of 1831 the property in the staircase was conveyed to B; (2) that A only obtained a servitude of access over it; and (3) that the prescriptive possession by him and his successors could not turn a right of access into a right of property.

Property—Building Restriction—Contravention by other feuars—Acquiescence.—The disposition of the upper storey of a tenement, dated in 1830, conveyed a piece of ground at the back, subject to the restriction that no building of any kind in the back-ground should be higher than 12 feet. In 1904 the owner of the said upper storey proposed to build on the piece of ground a building exceeding 12 feet in height, and the owner of the remaining portion of the tenement objected. It was proved that the other back-greens in the street, which were all held from the same superior and subject to the same restriction, had been built over without objection, and that the objector had expressly assented to a similar building on the back-green of the house next door. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the restriction was no longer binding.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

PRIOR to 1830 a self-contained house in Glasgow, bounded on the south by Bath Street and on the west by Wellington Street, with an entrance from Bath Street, was divided into two houses, the upper floor and the lower floor, an annex being built to the north end facing Wellington Street, with a stair leading to the upper floor.

In 1830 Alexander Campbell, the proprietor of both houses and of 1042 square yards of ground on which the houses were built, disponed the upper flat to Nathaniel Stevenson "together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street" with a plot of ground adjoining Wellington Street.

In 1831 Campbell disponed to A. G. Lang the 1042 square yards with the exception of the subjects conveyed to Stevenson.

In 1904 Robertson's trustees, Lang's successors, raised an action against John Wilson Bruce, Stevenson's successor, concluding for declarator (1) that the pursuers had a right of common interest in the defender's subjects, and that the defender was not entitled to erect any new buildings thereon of a height exceeding 12 feet, and particularly that he was not entitled to erect buildings in a back court forming part and pertinent of his property; and (2) that the staircase No. 144 Wellington Street, Glasgow, belonged in property to the pursuers, subject only to a right of access in favour of the defender. There were also conclusions for interdict.

The following narrative of the titles to the respective properties is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney):—

"The disposition to Lang bore to convey to him an area of ground consisting of 1042 square yards and 6 square feet, bounded on the north by the centre of a meuse lane, on the south by the centre of Bath Street, on the east by property belonging to Robert Craig, and on the west by the centre of Wellington Street. But from this conveyance there is the following exception:—'Excepting the second or upper flat of the said tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belongs as part and pertinent to the said second or upper flat, all as then possessed by William Buchanan conveyed by me to Nathaniel Stevenson.'

"The subject excepted in favour of Stevenson is thus described in the disposition by Campbell to him:—'The second or upper flat of the tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belongs as part and pertinent to the said second or upper flat, all as then possessed by William Buchanan, which tenement was erected upon all and whole the area or piece of ground consisting of 1042 square yards and 6 square feet, or thereby.'

"The disposition in favour of the defender's predecessor contains this clause, by which, the pursuers say, there was constituted a real burden on the property sold:—'Declaring always, . . . that for the utility and ornament of the house to be erected on the said steading of ground, and of the other houses forming the compartment or division to which it belongs, these presents are granted with and under the following provisions, regulations, and conditions:— . . . Quarto. No building of any kind in the back-ground shall be higher than 12 feet from the level of the ground to the ridge of the roof thereof: it being understood, however, that the west front of the lodging to be erected on the steading of ground above described, that is, its front to Wellington Street, may be built upon as high as to correspond with the height of the other lodgings built upon the compartment to which it belongs.'"

With reference to the staircase referred to in the second declaratory conclusion of the summons the defender averred;—(Ans. 1) "Explained that such stair and staircase are and can only be entered from Wellington Street, and have been exclusively, uninterruptedly, and peaceably used, enjoyed, and possessed by the defender and his predecessors in title for more than forty years as their own exclusive property, or in any event as a part and pertinent of the property now possessed by the defender as after mentioned. Said staircase and stair form and have been so used as an access, not only to said upper flat, but also to the cellarage and to the back-ground belonging to the defender. The said staircase does not give access to any property other than the defender's, and is part and portion of the 'second or upper flat' now his property as after described. In or about the year 1871, the predecessor of the defender fitted up on the landing of subject only to a right of access in favour of the defender. There were also conclusions for interdict.

The following narrative of the titles to the respective properties is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney):—

"The disposition to Lang bore to convey to him an area of ground consisting of 1042 square yards and 6 square feet, bounded on the north by the centre of a meuse lane, on the south by the centre of Bath Street, on the east by property belonging to Robert Craig, and on the west by the centre of Wellington Street. But from this conveyance there is the following exception:—'Excepting the second or upper flat of the said tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belongs as part and pertinent to the said second or upper flat, all as then possessed by William Buchanan conveyed by me to Nathaniel Stevenson.'

"The subject excepted in favour of Stevenson is thus described in the disposition by Campbell to him:—'The second or upper flat of the tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belongs as part and pertinent to the said second or upper flat, all as then possessed by William Buchanan, which tenement was erected upon all and whole the area or piece of ground consisting of 1042 square yards and 6 square feet, or thereby.'

"The disposition in favour of the defender's predecessor contains this clause, by which, the pursuers say, there was constituted a real burden on the property sold:—'Declaring always, . . . that for the utility and ornament of the house to be erected on the said steading of ground, and of the other houses forming the compartment or division to which it belongs, these presents are granted with and under the following provisions, regulations, and conditions:— . . . Quarto. No building of any kind in the back-ground shall be higher than 12 feet from the level of the ground to the ridge of the roof thereof: it being understood, however, that the west front of the lodging to be erected on the steading of ground above described, that is, its front to Wellington Street, may be built upon as high as to correspond with the height of the other lodgings built upon the compartment to which it belongs.'"

With reference to the staircase referred to in the second declaratory conclusion of the summons the defender averred;—(Ans. 1) "Explained that such stair and staircase are and can only be entered from Wellington Street, and have been exclusively, uninterruptedly, and peaceably used, enjoyed, and possessed by the defender and his predecessors in title for more than forty years as their own exclusive property, or in any event as a part and pertinent of the property now possessed by the defender as after mentioned. Said staircase and stair form and have been so used as an access, not only to said upper flat, but also to the cellarage and to the back-ground belonging to the defender. The said staircase does not give access to any property other than the defender's, and is part and portion of the 'second or upper flat' now his property as after described. In or about the year 1871, the predecessor of the defender fitted up on the landing of said staircase a water-closet for the use of his premises. The pursuers or their predecessors acquiesced in the formation of such water-closet, and neither the pursuers nor their predecessors have at any time challenged the formation or continued existence of such water-closet."

With reference to the restriction on building above quoted the defender averred;—(Ans. 7) "At that date, 1822, this part of the estate of Blythswood was entirely residential in character, and the conditions referred to were inserted for the benefit of the superior and of Thomas Burns and John Forrest. The pursuers have no title to enforce them. Since said date any restrictions contained in the titles, if applicable to the plot of ground on which the defender proposes to build, have been infringed in the knowledge and with the acquiescence of all persons interested therein, by the other feuars or proprietors, including the pursuers, on the estate of Blythswood, of which said plot forms part, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the property in question, and in particular in the compartment in which said property is situated, not only in regard to the height and construction of the buildings, but also in the uses to which they are to be applied. There are and for many years have been numerous steam-engines used in buildings on the part of said estate to which said restrictions apply, in contravention of the stipulations in the titles, all without objection. In the property immediately adjoining the defender's property there is a large steam-engine in use. Further, the pursuers themselves, or their predecessors in title, have by an agreement, a copy of which is produced, entered into with the owners of the adjoining property, agreed to a departure from the terms contained in the titles. They have also, in particular, infringed the terms of the restrictions on which they found in the present action by erecting on the subjects contained in their title a back building of greater height than is allowed thereon by the titles, and, in any event, considerably exceeding 12 feet in height. Said building is occupied as a stable, also in contravention of the stipulations in pursuers' titles. The property in question is situated in a busy commercial quarter of Glasgow. Originally the properties in the immediate neighbourhood were used as dwelling-houses, but with the growth of the city of Glasgow the whole character of the district has changed. The dwelling-houses have been converted into commercial premises, in which various trades involving the use of steam and other machinery are carried on, business premises, offices, hotels, Turkish baths, &c. Back-greens have also been built over, and buildings of greatly increased height, far exceeding 12 feet, or the height of the defender's proposed buildings, have been erected. In particular this has taken place in the 'compartment' referred to, of which said plot of ground forms part."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuers as proprietors in the same tenement with defender having a common interest in said back-ground with the defender and the use proposed to be made by the defender of said back-ground being injurious to said interest and in violation of the law of the tenement, decree of declarator and interdict should be granted as concluded for with respect to said back-ground. (4) The defender having proposed to erect upon said back-ground buildings which are in violation of the restrictions contained in the titles thereof, which restrictions the pursuers have an interest to enforce, decree of declarator and interdict should be granted in terms of the conclusions of the summons relative to said back-ground. (5) The defender having no right of property in the stair and staircase, but merely a right of access thereby to the upper flat of the present tenement, is not entitled to make any alterations upon said staircase, and should be interdicted from so doing.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The plot of ground in dispute having been disponed to the defender and his authors, either in absolute property or as part and pertinent of the upper flat of the property in question, the defender has the sole right of property therein. (4) The defender's authors and the defender having enjoyed the exclusive possession and use of said stair and staircase and plot of ground for more than forty years continuously and uninterruptedly under a title flowing from the common author of the defender and pursuers, have acquired the sole right of property therein by positive prescription. (5) The pursuers being unable to qualify any right, title, or interest, to object to the defender's proposed buildings, the defender should be assoilzied. (6) There being no valid or binding restrictions now existing enforceable by the pursuers, prohibiting the defender from erecting the proposed buildings, the defender should be assoilzied. (7) The pursuers are barred by their own actings, and by the actings of their predecessors in title and by acquiescence, from interfering with the defender in the erection of the proposed buildings, and the defender should accordingly be assoilzied.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence was that the staircase, which was not a part of the house as originally designed, but had been added before 1830, had been always used by the defender and his predecessors substantially as stated by him in the averments quoted above, and that access to it could only be obtained by them. With regard to the building restrictions, John Martin, writer, Glasgow, a witness for the defender, deponed,—"I have known the district for about thirty years. As regards their surroundings, there has been a considerable change during that period. Private dwelling-houses have been converted into business premises, warehouses, offices, and shops all round. (Q.) And have the pursuers themselves consented to alterations on the property immediately to the east of them? (A.) Their predecessors did. It was Mr Dunlop who started a departure from the building restrictions in that feu-contract. The pursuers have homologated that. The pursuers' predecessors consented to a tenement four storeys in height being erected on the back-ground of the property immediately to the east. That is in contravention of the building restrictions, which limited the height of buildings to 12 feet at the back, and two and-a-half storeys at the front. The building restrictions have been disregarded so far as regards both front and back buildings. On the pursuers' own back-ground there is a stable, which I think is 16 or 17 feet high, but I did not measure the actual height." Similar evidence was given by other witnesses for the defender, and no evidence to the contrary was led by the pursuers.

On 20th December 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the first, second, fourth, fifth, and sixth pleas in law for the pursuers: Assoilzies the defender from the conclusion for declarator of property in the staircase mentioned on record, and from the conclusion for declarator of right to prevent the defender from erecting any buildings on the ground described as part and pertinent of the upper flat specified on record of a greater height

No. 106. than 12 feet: Refuses the interdict craved: Quoad ultra dismisses the action," &c.*

Mar. 14, 1905. Robertson's Trustees v. Bruce.

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative of the titles quoted above)—This action has been raised by the owners of the subjects first described against the owner of the subjects described secondly; and the conclusions with which it is necessary to deal are these,—(1) for declarator that the pursuers are entitled to prevent the defender from erecting on the ground described as part and pertinent of the upper flat disponed to Stevenson, and belonging to the defender, that is to say, on the area marked 'Back Court' on the plan No. 6 of process, any buildings of a greater height than 12 feet; (2) for declarator 'that the staircase No. 144 Wellington Street, Glasgow, belongs in property to the pursuers . . subject only to a right of access in favour of the defender and his successors to the upper flat of the tenement and the cellar entering thereby, and that the defender or his foresaids are not entitled without the pursuers' consent to make any alterations on the said staircase.'

"There are other conclusions, but I understood they were not pressed, and consider it unnecessary to decide them.

"The questions then are these two,—Are the pursuers entitled to decree of declarator (1) that they are proprietors of the staircase, and (2) that the defender is not entitled to erect buildings of a certain height on the area marked 'Back Court' on the plan No. 6 of process?

"The staircase is not mentioned in the titles, but it is fully described in the proof. It is certainly built on part of the 1042 square yards and 6 square feet, which are described in the pursuers' title; and is, therefore, included in that title, if it be not excluded by the exception, and the question, therefore, is, whether it can be held to be included in the exception.

"It is a staircase which is entered from the street door in Wellington Street, mentioned in the title. It has thirty-one steps, and leads to 'the second or upper floor,' conveyed by the disposition by Campbell to Stevenson. By the same door access is had to the defender's back-ground and cellarage. The staircase was probably built when the tenement, originally a single house, was converted into two houses about 1828 or 1830 or thereby. It was not a part of the original building, but is a building which has been added to the original building.

"It would not have been of any use as a part of the original building, and is admittedly of no use at present to the pursuers. It leads to no part of their tenement or ground. But it is absolutely essential to the defender, who has no other access to his upper flat, and by whom and his predecessors it has been used for that purpose for more than forty years. The access to the staircase is by the door in Wellington Street. That door was frequently shut, and people desirous of reaching the upper flat were in use to pull a bell, which communicated with an interior door to the flat at the top of the staircase, when the outside door was opened, if shut, and the visitors to the upper flat were admitted to the staircase. No one but the owner of the upper flat had the means otherwise of getting access by the outside door except by means of a key. There is no doubt at all that the possession and use of the staircase had, since it was built, been altogether with the defender and his predecessors. The pursuers have never taken any benefit from it, or incurred any expense in connection with it.

"But such reasoning is open to question, and it must be admitted that it is not easy to hold that the staircase is included in or described by the words of the disposition.

"It was argued that the words in the defender's title, 'with access thereto,' that is to the upper flat by a street door from Wellington Street, were adverse to the defender's case, and tended to shew that his right in the staircase was a right of access, not of property. But it seems to me that the argument may be turned the other way, for the words are that the access is by a door, not by a staircase, and it might be argued that they im-

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) It was clear from the titles that the property in the staircase was in the pursuers. All the defender had was a right of access. If that were so, no amount of possession would turn the servitude right of access into a right of property,[1] and all the possession shewn to have been had by the defender here was attributable to access, not to property.[2] In Taylor v. Dunlop,[3] which was a case relating to the same house, the Judges were clearly of opinion that the staircase belonged to the predecessors of the pursuers. (2) The restriction on building was part of the law of the tenement, and could be enforced by the pursuers, even although similar restrictions had not been enforced in the neighbourhood. It was a negative servitude in their favour, which could not be lost non utendo.[4]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The proof shewed exclusive use of the staircase by the defender and his authors. The titles did not ported that, when once a man had passed the access, he was within the subject itself, and therefore it might be suggested that the staircase was part of, and was included in the upper flat.

"I do not say that there is much in that suggestion, but it seems to support the view that these descriptions are far from clear, and admit of a reference to usage in order to interpret the title; and if once resort is had to usage, as interpreting the title, no question remains, because the usage is all one way; and I think that the words are susceptible of the meaning, although it must be admitted to be strained.

"The pursuers referred to the case of Taylor v. Dunlop, 1st November 1872, 11 Macph. 25, which was an action between the predecessors of the present parties about this very property. It did not, however, relate to the staircase, but to the roof of this upper flat. The question in this case was not debated or stated. But the titles were before the Court, and certainly the Lord President expressed the opinion that the pursuers' predecessor was the proprietor of the staircase, and that the predecessor of the defender was not; although I do not think that the other Judges expressed that opinion. But in that case there was no proof, and the Lord President's opinion was only an opinion on the titles without any reference to the facts which have been brought forward in this case as interpreting the title; and, if the titles only were looked to, and the facts were not inquired into, there could be no hesitation in preferring the pursuers' title. But when the history and structure of the building and the possession and use of it are taken into consideration, I hold that the primary meaning of the language is displaced, and that it may receive an interpretation in accordance with the facts.

"As to the other point, namely, the declarator that the pursuers are entitled to prevent the defender from erecting buildings of a greater height than 12 feet on their back area, I understand that that is the only part of the more complicated conclusion on which the pursuers ask a decision. I have quoted in my opinion the clause in the disposition on which it is founded, and I must admit that I fail to understand it, having in view the qualifying clause as to the frontage to Wellington Street and the fact that the buildings along Wellington Street and Bath Street are high buildings, much higher than 12 feet. The clause is an old one taken from the earlier titles of 1822 or thereby, and, since that date, there appears to have been a great many tenements erected in that locality. I do not feel warranted in saying that the provision is ineffectual on account of these buildings, but I expressly mention the staircase, or at least were ambiguous on the subject, and therefore the ownership of it must be determined by the possession.[1] That was unquestionably with the defender. The grant of a right of access meant an access to the stair over ground the solum of which belonged to the pursuers. (2) It was settled law that building restrictions of the kind now in question could not be enforced if the breach of similar conditions in subjects in the same street and derived from the same superior had been acquiesced in by all concerned.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case there are two questions (first) as to the rights of the defender in regard to a staircase and the building in which the staircase is erected, and (second) as to the rights of the defender in relation to a back court of his premises, the dispute being as to whether he is entitled to erect certain buildings on it.

On the first question my opinion is that there is no right of property in the defender to the staircase or the annex to the dwelling-house which contains it. What the defender has by his title is a right of access to his house on the upper flat through a door opening from the street and by the stair inside the doorway. This of itself is adverse to the idea of his having a property right. For the gift of a right of access into and through a structure seems on the face of it to be inconsistent with the subject through or over which the access is given being the property of the person to whom the access is conceded. The concession is one quite unnecessary, and I think practically unintelligible in such a case, the person who confers the right in so doing asserting a right of property in himself, and the person accepting it tacitly confessing that without it he has no right.

The attempt was made to interpret the grant as referring only to a right to enter the door from the street on the footing that the granter of the right had the sole right to the solum of the street, and that therefore access to the door could not be had unless it was conceded by the pursuers. This seems to me to be a suggestion which has nothing to commend it except its ingenuity, and it does not, as I think, agree with the terms used in the title.

am of opinion that the declarator asked differs materially from the provision in the defender's title, and is not warranted by it.

"The case is full of minute and intricate details which have a bearing on the main question. But it would be out of the question to examine them minutely in this opinion. I have done my best to consider and understand them, but I can do no more than indicate the main grounds of my judgment.

"On the whole I am of opinion that declarator cannot be pronounced affirming the pursuers' right of property in the staircase,—it is not essential that I should pronounce any judgment as to the defender's right,—and that the titles do not warrant the decree of declarator asked, that the pursuers are entitled to prevent the defender from building on the area specified buildings above 12 feet high."

Robertson's Trustees v. Bruce.

If these views be sound then it appears to be plain that there can be no setting up of a title by the defender upon any plea of possession. Any possession the defender has had is attributable directly to the grant given to him, and cannot therefore be ascribed to any supposed grant of a different kind evidenced by the possession which has not in any way gone beyond the bounds of the express grant.

The other question—namely, whether the defender can be restrained from building over his back court has, I think, been rightly decided by the Lord Ordinary. The clause in the title on which the objection is founded may be somewhat obscure, but so far as it can be interpreted, I am of opinion that it cannot be founded on effectually to support the pursuers' case. It is a clause which is brought from the older titles, to the whole ground at this place, and imported into this one, and is one intended to operate a general restraint upon the building powers of feuars in that street. One thing seems plain enough, that the clause was in no way intended as a restriction applying separately and exclusively to the site with which it deals. Its whole tenor is against that idea. The clause had to be inserted in respect of the obligation in the granter's own title, in order that the steading divided off might be in the same general position as regarded restriction on building as the other steadings.

If this be so, the only remaining question is whether the clause is now operative so as to entitle the pursuers to insist on it against the defender. Now, it is certain from what we have seen in the case that the greater part if not all of the Bath Street properties have now buildings erected on the back-greens, and the pursuers themselves have been parties to the ground at the back of the next adjacent steading being occupied by buildings. This, as it seems to me, is conclusive of the case under the decisions which were referred to by the defender during the debate.

I would therefore move your Lordships to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, to find for the pursuers on the declarator and interdict in regard to the staircase, and to assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of declarator and interdict in regard to the back-ground.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case, upon the first question which was argued, viz., the question as to the property of the staircase (or rather of the staircase building), I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary. I do not myself see that there is any ambiguity in the defender's title. It, I think, quite clearly excludes the staircase and the building or annex which contains it. The defender is, I think, expressly confined to a right of access to his upper flat by the staircase, or—what comes to the same thing—by the door of the building which leads to the staircase and opens on to the street. And I do not, I confess, see how it is possible that a person should be given a right of access through a structure which is his own property, or by or through a door which is part of that structure, and is thus also his own property. Neither do I see how the defender's title can be read as applying merely to a right of access to the door mentioned over the half of the street which he says is not included in his title. That is, I think, a very extreme suggestion, not I observe accepted by the Lord Ordinary. It is not in accord with the language of the title; and it is also open to this observation, that if the staircase was carried by the title as a pertinent of the upper flat, there would seem to be no reason why the solum of the street ex adverso should not also be carried.

This being so—the construction of the title being clear—it appears to me that there is no room for inferences as to the right of property sought to be drawn from the evidence as to the possession. A servitude—a right of access—can never by any amount of possession be converted into a right of property. Nor—assuming that the defender's authors did in fact have what they call exclusive use of this staircase—can right of exclusive use—as distinguished from a right of property—be constituted or recognised under our law—Leck v. Chalmers.[1]

I am therefore of opinion, in conformity with the views expressed, substantially I think, upon this very question by the Judges of the First Division in the case of Taylor v. Dunlop,[2] that the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator with respect to the property of the staircase in terms of the conclusion of their summons.

As to the other question—the question as to the defender's right to build over the back court—I agree with the Lord Ordinary's conclusion. I am not sure that I agree that the clause in the title which is said to constitute the restriction is unintelligible. But if intelligible, I agree that it is only intelligible in a sense which is fatal to its subsistence. It is quite plain that the clause in question—the clause against erection of buildings on the back-ground—was not introduced for the first time upon the division of the original steading in 1830, or introduced with any special reference to that division. It was simply a repetition, such as the previous titles required, of a restriction affecting not merely the steading divided, but the neighbouring steadings in Bath Street. And therefore the question comes really to be quo intuitu was it repeated in 1830? Was it repeated by way of making it an independent condition, forming in a special sense part of the law of the newly divided tenement? or, was it repeated simply as one of the conditions applicable to all the steadings in that part of Bath Street? It is in this view, as it appears to me, that the terms of the clause which the Lord Ordinary holds to be unintelligible are important. For I think they are intelligible to this extent that they are at least inconsistent with the idea that the restriction in question was adopted with special reference to the division in 1830 of Mr Campbell's steading. If that had been meant, I think it impossible that the clause would have been expressed as it is expressed, viz., as imposing a restriction upon the back-ground of steadings (not already erected but) "to be erected." Taking the clause as we have it, it must I think be taken that it was inserted by Mr Campbell simply because under his title it required to be so inserted under pain of nullity, and with no further or other purpose than that of bringing the two divided subjects into the same position with the undivided steading and the adjacent steadings in Bath Street.

But then if that be so, can there be any doubt upon the evidence that the restriction in question has been discharged by acquiescence, just in the same way as if, for instance, Mr Campbell had remained proprietor of the original steading, and the present question arose between him and some of his neighbours? I am, I confess, unable to see that there can be much doubt on that subject. For not only does it appear—unless I wholly misunderstand the evidence—that the whole or most of the steadings in this division of Bath Street have had their back-greens built over, contrary to the common restriction, but the house next door to the pursuers' on the east—a house certainly subject to the same restriction—has had its back ground quite recently built over, and so built over not only with the tacit but with the express consent of the pursuers. I cannot in these circumstances see how a judgment in the pursuers' favour on this part of the case can be reconciled with the well-known class of decisions beginning with Campbell v. Clydesdale Bank,[1] and including, amongst many others, Fraser v. Downie,[2] and Liddall v. Duncan,[3] or with the law as laid down in those cases and in such cases as Bunten[4] and Johnston.[5]

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK intimated that LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD KINCAIRNEY, not having heard the argument, gave no opinion.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, decerned for the pursuers in terms of the conclusions of the summons in so far as relating to the staircase, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions in so far as relating to the back-ground.

Process—"All Parties not called"—Interdict between crofters on same estate as to taking seaware—Landlord not called—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29).—In 1903 crofters, who were in the occupation of their crofts at the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and whose rents were fixed by the Commissioners under the Act in 1889, brought an action against certain neighbouring crofters who held of the same landlord, for interdict against the defenders infringing rights which the pursuers averred that they possessed, as pertinents of their crofts, of taking seaware from the seashore (belonging to the common landlord) in the neighbourhood of the crofts. The defenders' crofts were not in existence at the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, but were formed out of two farms under the powers of the Congested Districts (Scotland) Act, 1897. The pursuers averred that they were entitled to take seaware to the extent to which they had been in use to take it at the date when their rents were fixed; and that the defenders were not entitled to take it to any greater extent than the two tenant farmers had been in use to take it at that date. They averred that the defenders were now taking more than the farmers had been in use to take. The pursuers did not produce any written contract, estate regulation, or finding of the Crofter Commission defining the extent of seaware to which they were entitled. The defenders stated that they had the authority of the landlord for taking seaware as they had taken it, and pleaded "All parties not called," in respect that the landlord had not been called as a defender.

The Court sustained the plea and dismissed the action.

Question per Lord Kyllachy, whether pertinential privileges of the kind claimed by the pursuers, held by crofting tenants at the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act were then or are now of the nature of legal rights, or were not then, and are not now, rather (apart from express title falling under some recognised legal category) privileges held necessarily at the landlord's pleasure, and subject always to estate regulations.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness-shire.

IN this action for interdict, raised in the Sheriff Court at Lochmaddy in March 1903, the pursuers, Angus Mackinnon and others, and the defenders, Donald Macdonald and others, were all crofters in North Uist, under Sir Arthur John Campbell-Orde of Kilmory, Baronet, proprietor of North Uist.

The pursuers were the whole crofters of the townships of Malaglate and Middlequarter in North Uist. Prior to the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,[1] they or their predecessors were tenants of their respective holdings upon a yearly tenancy; thereafter they held upon the tenure created by that Act, and their rents were fixed by the Crofter Commissioners in 1889.

The defenders were crofters on the farms of Sollas and Grenitote. At the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, each of these farms was let to one tenant farmer, there being no crofter on either farm, and they so continued down to 1898. In 1898 both farms were broken up into crofts, and at Martinmas 1898 the defenders became respectively tenants of these crofts in virtue of agreements between the defenders, the trustees of the late Sir John W. P. Campbell-Orde, Baronet, and the Commissioners under the Congested Districts (Scotland) Act, 1897.[2]

The prayer of the action was in substance to have the defenders interdicted from taking away seaware from the shore ex adverso of certain parts of North Uist except to the extent of certain specified shares of said seaware, and from interfering with the pursuers "in the lawful exercise of their undoubted right to cut or collect and carry away" seaware from the said shore to the extent of certain specified shares.

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 3) "The pursuers, or their predecessors, were, at the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,* the crofters in possession as tenants of the crofting lands of Malaglate and Middlequarter, and held, along with their holdings, and inseparable therefrom, certain rights of seaware for the purpose of obtaining manure for the arable ground of their holdings." The pursuers then made averments as to the shares of seaware belonging respectively to the townships of Malaglate and Middlequarter, and the farms of Sollas and Grenitote. (Cond. 4) "By the operation of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, the pursuers were confirmed in, and obtained an inalienable right to said shares in the seaware, tangle, and other growth or substance thrown upon the seashore ex adverso the lands condescended on, as parts and pertinents of their holdings, . . . and they cannot be deprived therefrom so long as they continue tenants of their holdings under said Act. It is averred that, when having fair rents fixed for their holdings by the Crofters Commission in the year 1889, it was expressly stated to the Commissioners, and admitted as correct by the late Sir John William Powlett Campbell-Orde, Baronet, the then proprietor of North Uist, that the pursuers had the rights to seaware and tangle as condescended on on said shore as part of their holdings, and their rents were accordingly fixed on that footing, and still remain as then fixed. The curtailment of their right of seaware and tangle would seriously depreciate the value of the pursuers' holdings, and render same next to valueless as agricultural subjects, and any interference with this right cannot fail to be to the serious hurt of the pursuers." (Cond. 5) "The farms of Sollas and Grenitote were in 1898 cut up into crofters' holdings. . . . The new crofting tenants of Sollas and Grenitote took up and exercised the right to seaware and tangle exactly as such had previously been possessed by the farms of Sollas and Grenitote respectively, as set forth in condescendence third hereof; and the defenders continued so to exercise said right down till the 5th day of February 1903." (Cond. 6) "In or about the beginning of February 1903 the defenders, without consulting the pursuers, made a new division of the seashores in question, and of the share of seaware and tangle thrown thereon, under which the Grenitote defenders took possession on 5th February 1903 of certain shores (part of pursuers' rights) over which they had not previously exercised any seaware or tangle rights or control, and collected and removed the seaware and tangle therefrom, and the Sollas defenders enlarged and extended their right by collecting and removing a greater share of seaware and tangle than they had right to take from the seashore they had an interest in, while at the same time the defenders refused to allow the pursuers to exercise their undoubted lawful right of collecting and carrying away seaware and tangle from certain parts of the seashore, or to allow them access thereto. The action of the defenders was illegal and unwarrantable, and was persisted in in defiance of the protests of the pursuers."

The defenders in answer averred;—(Ans. 3) " . . . The claims and rights of parties, in the obtaining of seaware for the manuring of the arable ground of their holdings, has been stated to the defenders, by or on behalf of the landlord, to be, and is in accordance with division thereof, made on or about 16th March 1861 on behalf of the then landlord" by his factor, "a certified copy of which is herewith produced and referred to." (Ans. 5) " . . . The new crofting tenants of said farms [Sollas and Grenitote] were entitled to and took up on the authority of the landlord the right of seaware and tangle, as such had previously been possessed by the occupants of said farms, also they exercised that right to the extent which in their judgment they for the time being saw fit."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers having from time immemorial exercised the right of gathering, collecting, and carrying away the seaware and tangle and other substance ex adverso of the lands of North Uist, as set forth, as a right attached to their holdings, and said right being vested in them in virtue of the provisions of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, they are entitled to continue the exercise thereof. (3) The defenders having no right to any share in the seaware and tangle thrown upon the seashore ex adverso of said lands, other than as condescended on, cannot extend or enlarge upon their rights without the pursuers' consent, or deprive the pursuers of any part of their rights, and the pursuers are entitled to interdict against them as craved.

The landlord was not called as a defender, and the defenders in consequence pleaded;—(2) All parties not called. The defenders further pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 5th August 1903 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell) hoc statu repelled, inter alia, the second plea in law for the defenders, in so far as preliminary, reserving its effect on the merits, and before further answer allowed a proof. The import of the evidence led at the proof sufficiently appears from the interlocutor and note of the Sheriff (C. N. Johnston, K.C.).

On 23d July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) That the pursuers . . . and their predecessors were, at the date of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, in occupation of their crofts or holdings, with certain rights or privileges of winning seaware for manurial purposes, as previously defined and apportioned by the landlord; but (2) that they have failed to prove that they or their predecessors in said crofts had or exercised the rights to seaware according to the divisions or in the proportions as claimed and condescended on from time immemorial, or at the date of said Act; and that they have also failed to prove that the fair rents of their crofts or holdings were fixed by the Crofters Commission on the footing that they had or exercised those rights as condescended on . . . (4) that it is not proved that defenders have refused to allow pursuers to collect and carry away such seaware and others as they had a duly recognised and legal right to collect and carry away, or deprived pursuers of any part of such rights: Therefore sustains the fifth plea in law stated for defenders; refuses the prayer of the petition . . . and assoilzies defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds pursuers jointly and severally liable to defenders in expenses: Allows," &c.

On appeal the Sheriff (C. N. Johnston, K.C.) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 23d July 1904: Finds (1) that the defenders are tenants of certain holdings in the island of North Uist formed out of the farms of Sollas and Grenitote, and occupy their holdings under and in virtue of agreements entered into by and between them and the trustees of the late Sir John William Powlett Campbell-Orde, Bart., of North Uist, and the Congested Districts (Scotland) Commissioners in 1898; (2) that the defenders enjoy as a pertinent of their holdings certain rights of winning seaweed on certain portions of the shore of the estate of North Uist; (3) that the defenders have exercised, and propose to exercise, these rights at the places, in the manner, and to the extent pointed out to them by the estate factor; (4) that the pursuers are crofters in the township of Malaglate and Middlequarter on the said estate adjoining the said farms of Sollas and Grenitote; (5) that the pursuers claim as pertinents of their crofts certain joint rights along with the defenders of winning seaweed on the said portions of the shore; (6) that the extent of pursuers' rights is not fixed or defined by any written contract, judicial decree, or finding of the Crofters Commission, or by any written estate regulations upon which pursuers found, and that the pursuers have failed to prove that it is fixed or defined by any immemorial usage; (7) that the pursuers base their claims upon (a) the state of possession at the date of the passing of the Crofters Act; (b) an alleged modification thereof under a verbal arrangement with the factor in 1888; (c) the state of possession when their fair rents were fixed in 1889; (d) the state of possession subsequent thereto; and (e) the alleged disability of the proprietor, in respect of the foregoing considerations, to make any re-arrangement or now to enforce any estate regulation of older date: Finds in law that the grounds of claim upon which pursuers rely cannot conveniently be adjudicated upon in the absence of the proprietor, and that the defenders, in the absence of the proprietor, ought not to be called upon to answer or discuss them with the pursuers: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defenders: . . . Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable, jointly and severally, to the defenders in expenses: Allows," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This is a deplorable litigation. In its slow and sullen flight it has gathered round it a process of portentous magnitude, and its consequences must, I fear, be ruinous to some of the parties concerned. In view of the expense which has been entailed, and the time and trouble which have been expended, I should have been very reluctant to dispose of the case upon the plea of 'all parties not called' had I seen my way apart from that plea to reach a result different from that at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived. Whilst, however, I might not have adopted all his inferences, I should have come to the same conclusion as he has reached had I thought that it was necessary or proper to dispose of the case on its merits in the absence of the landlord—in other words, I should have found that the pursuers, whatever their rights and remedies, had not made out their case as laid. As, however, I think that the landlord ought—perhaps in any case, but certainly in view of the circumstances disclosed in the pursuers' proof—to have been called as a defender, I do not think it proper or in the interests of the pursuers themselves to ignore the plea in which the defenders still insist of 'all parties not called.'

"In these circumstances, I ought in strictness to say no more. But in view of the nature of the case and the peculiar position of the parties, I think that it may be convenient for them if I should indicate the view which I take of certain aspects of the case. In the absence of the landlord I can do so only provisionally.

"The defenders entered upon their holdings in 1898, and for some years they were busy erecting buildings, &c., and were therefore not in a position fully to cultivate their lands or to use all the seaware to which, as they now say, they are entitled. Accordingly, pursuers and defenders were each able to take all they wanted without mutual interference. In the year 1903, however, the defenders were in a position to use more, and, in these circumstances, a question arose between them and the pursuers as to the measure of their respective rights. The defenders, as was proper, communicated with the estate factor, and asked him what seaware they were entitled to. By letter, dated 29th January 1903 (No. 121), the factor gave to the defenders the particulars of what, in his view, was the authoritative estate division of the seaware between the respective townships interested, sending them a copy of the division as made by the factor in 1861. The defenders shewed this letter to the pursuers or to some of their representatives, and

The pursuers appealed. At the hearing the argument was confined to the defenders' plea of all parties not called.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was not necessary that the landlord should be called, as this was a purely possessory action between two sets of tenants.[1] The landlord had no interest to be called; in any event, any judgment in the present action would not be res judicata against him. The fair rents paid by the pursuers were fixed after taking into consideration the amount of seaware which the pursuers and their predecessors were in use to get, and so long as these fair rents continued to be paid and the landlord did not go to the Crofters Commission, as he was entitled to do, to have the rents readjusted, the pursuers were entitled to secure their possession of the seaware by interdict, as in a question with the defenders, without bringing the landlord into the process. Neither the pursuers nor the defenders were ordinary tenants, and the landlord had really very little interest claimed right to no more than the factor thus pointed out to them. In these circumstances, the pursuers raised the present action of interdict. Whatever may be the legal rights of the matter as between the pursuers and the landlord, the conduct of the defenders appears to me not open to any observation, and it would certainly be a great hardship if they had to bear the expense of litigating the matter. It may be that they would have been bound to meet the pursuers, if the latter had had any written title defining the extent or the limits of their rights, but they have produced nothing of the kind, and the grounds to be noticed presently upon which they rest their claim, whether well founded or not, are quite inappropriate for trial between them and the defenders.

"At the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings Acts of 1886, the pursuers were crofters in possession, as yearly tenants, of holdings to which were attached certain rights of taking seaware for manurial purposes. The measure of the exercise of this right, as regards locality generally, and as between different townships and farms, on certain stretches of shore in which they had joint rights, was matter controlled by estate regulations, which might be altered from time to time, or which the parties, by mutual arrangement, might temporarily vary. The last division by the estate seems to have been made in 1861, and the estate authorities still regard that as the binding rule in the event of an appeal to them. It does not appear clear, however, that this division was ever strictly observed in practice, but I have little doubt that if at any time after 1861 a serious difficulty had arisen, and the matter had been referred to the estate authorities, they would have treated the 1861 division as binding and authoritative so far as they were concerned, until it should have been deliberately altered. It is suggested that this allocation of 1861 was altered at a verbal interview with the factor in 1888, or rather—for the pursuers do not admit that the 1861 division ever existed except in a tentative scroll—that a new allocation, superseding that which had been observed in practice, was made in 1888. It appears to me, however, that what the factor did in 1888 was not to make any new allocation to be recognised in future by the estate, but to arrange a modus vivendi by which the farmer's willingness to oblige the crofters by giving them more than they were entitled to was to be reconciled with the avoidance of quarrels between the crofters and the cottars on the farms.

"In the view which I take the crofters, upon the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act in 1886, became crofters with a right to certain holdings, and, as a pertinent thereto, the right—not of taking seaweed in perpetuity in the manner in which this seaware was apportioned between the pursuers and the defenders. In any case, the action ought not to be thrown out, as the Sheriff had done, after a proof had been led and much expense incurred. The landlord ought to have an opportunity of sisting himself.

Argued for the defenders;—The Sheriff's judgment sustaining the plea of all parties not called was well founded. The pursuers' case was that under the Crofters Holdings Act they had an inalienable right, as a pertinent of their holdings, to certain specific shares of the seaware in question. Neither of the Sheriffs had sustained the pursuers' case, but if the Court, on a consideration of the proof, took the opposite view, that judgment would be to the prejudice of the landlord. Technically, no doubt, such a judgment would not be res judicata against the landlord, but it would be a judgment of the Court, at the exact places which happened to be assigned to them in 1886, but—of taking seaweed subject, as had been the case in the past, to the estate regulations for the time being, or subject to the terms of any scheme adjusted by the Crofter Commission. That, as I conceive it, is still the nature of their tenure.

"The pursuers found strongly upon the proceedings before the Crofter Commission in 1889,* when their present rents were fixed. They maintain

* At the proof in the present action Mr P. B. MacIntyre, one of the Crofter Commissioners deponed:—"I am aware that Sir John Orde lodged a general statement with regard to the estate of North Uist. (Shewn No. 9 of process)—I suppose that is it. That statement contains the words 'that a plentiful supply of seaware is available without any other cost than carting,' and it was our understanding in connection with North Uist that there was a plentiful supply of seaware. We took that into consideration in fixing fair rents. I was the Commissioner on the fixing the fair rents in Middlequarter and Malaglate. . . . I cannot tell you what the shares of the crofters were; there were no definite rights before us at all. We just took the general statement of a plentiful supply in the absence of any complaint, and there was no complaint made. I would say a plentiful supply of seaware is necessary in that part of the country to the proper working of the holding. Without a plentiful supply the crofts would not be of the same value. . . . You may take it that, whatever that right was, the seaware possession taken into consideration was the state of the seaware possession exercised by the crofters at the date of fixing the fair rents, and that the value of a plentiful supply of seaware for manuring the holdings was included in the consideration in fixing these rents; there was no complaint made as to the want of seaware, wherever they got it. . . . I do not remember anything having been said about rules and regulations regulating the rights of crofters in Middlequarter and Malaglate to seaware; there was no demand for rules and regulations as to seaware there. . . . Cross.—When I fixed the fair rents in 1889, I fixed these rents on the assumption that there was a plentiful supply of seaware. We assumed that from the general statement and from the fact that there was no complaint. In the absence of any complaint we always understood that they got all the ware they wanted. In fixing these rents there was no inquiry as to the quantity of seaware that could be got, or inquiry as to where the seaware was got."

Sheriff Brand, the chairman of the Commissioners, deponed, inter alia, —"Seaware and peats are necessities of existence in these places. (Q.) Is seaware a necessary manure for the holding and an important factor in the value of the holding? (A.) The holding could not be carried on without seaware."

with all the authority of a judgment of the Court, which the landlord would have to meet in any proceedings that he might afterwards take. The landlord had a distinct interest in this matter, for he had given away to the defenders something that, if the pursuers were right, he was not entitled to give, so that he would or might be liable in damages to the defenders. If a landlord were alleged to have granted inconsistent rights to each of two tenants under ordinary leases, it would certainly as a rule be necessary that the landlord should be a party to any proceedings for the determination of the question, and the present parties were practically in the same position as ordinary tenants. If, indeed, the pursuers had produced a written title of some sort accurately defining the rights which they claimed, it might be that that would entitle them to a possessory judgment as in a question with the defenders, but it was clear on the evidence that the pursuers had failed to produce such a title. The findings of the Crofter Commissioners fixing the fair rents of the pursuers' holdings in 1889 did not define the extent of the pursuers' that these rents were fixed with reference to the particular rights which they now claim. I do not think, however, that the evidence shews that this was the case, that the nature and extent of these rights were ever brought under the cognisance of the Commissioners, or that the Commissioners recognised certain definite rights in the matter as belonging to the crofters, and as independent of estate regulation from time to time. It does, however, appear to me to be clear that the rents were fixed upon the footing that the pursuers had (as de facto they were then enjoying) a sufficient supply of seaware. It may very well be, therefore, that if they are not now afforded a sufficient supply, that would be a good reason for a revision of their rents. Pursuers go further, and hold that the state of possession which is the measure of their permanent rights as crofters is the state of possession when the fair rents were fixed. I am, I confess, unable to adopt this view.

"Upon the basis, however, that the pursuers are entitled to a sufficient supply for their holdings either in perpetuity or so long as the present rents remain unaltered, I am unable, upon the evidence, to affirm that they have not been left a sufficient supply. I think the proof leaves that an open question. There are strong general statements upon both sides, but there is no independent or precise evidence.

"I am not satisfied, however, that the recent changes may not involve some hardship upon the pursuers, although I am satisfied that the present action is not the remedy open to them. Circumstances have changed. Whatever may have been the recognised allocation before 1898, the pursuers were doubtless made welcome to all that they required after the needs of the two farms were supplied. Under the new condition of things far more must be required for the new settlements than was needed for the two farms. According to Mr M'Kenzie, the factor, the matter is a vital one for the new settlers. If there is not enough to go round, it must also be a vital one for the pursuers. If there is plenty for all, then it is difficult to see what interest the pursuers had to undertake the very serious burden of this case. If there is not plenty for all, then the old hereditary crofters are being prejudiced by the creation of these new settlements. It may be that an ample supply is left to the pursuers, and that, as is suggested by one or two witnesses for the defenders, they are a cross-grained, litigious body of men. I have not materials to be able to form a judgment upon that matter. The circumstances of the case, however, suggest that the creation of new settlements is a matter which requires much careful thinking out in detail before it is undertaken."

rights in this seaware, or even affirm that they had any such rights. No doubt the fact that there was a good supply of seaware was kept in view by the Commissioners in fixing the amount of the rents, but there was nothing in the proceedings of the Commissioners to deprive the landlord of his right to reallocate the seaware with the result possibly that the pursuers would have a good case for having their rents lowered by the Commissioners.

On 16th February 1905 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sist the cause meantime to allow the landlord to sist himself as a party to the cause, adopting the proof already led, and direct the pursuers to make intimation to him accordingly."

The landlord intimated that he did not desire to sist himself as a party. The Court then made avizandum.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On 16th February this case was continued in order to give the landlord an opportunity, if he desired, of sisting himself to the process and adopting the proof already led. Intimation was made to him accordingly, but he has not chosen to enter appearance. In these circumstances I think we ought to affirm the judgment appealed against.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur in thinking that we must affirm the Sheriff-principal's interlocutor. And I may say I do so with less reluctance because I greatly doubt whether, even if the landlord had appeared and adopted the proof, any final or really useful decision could have been obtained under this action. It would, whatever might have been decided, have, I am afraid, been always open to either party to bring a declarator so as to try over again and determine finally the question of right. What I really regret is that the present action was not at an early stage sisted of consent so as to enable such a declarator to be brought.

As it is, the present action is, I think, well ended and out of Court. And the only thing I should like to add is this, that I hope if the pursuers should contemplate further legal proceedings they will at least consider whether pertinential privileges of this kind held by crofting tenants at the passing of the Crofters Act were then or are now of the nature of legal rights; or were not and are not rather (apart from express title falling under some recognised legal category) privileges held necessarily at the landlord's pleasure and subject always to estate regulations. I express, of course, no opinion on that or any other question involved, but it does occur to me to doubt whether crofters in the pursuers' position have, if deprived of such privileges, any other redress than that of having their fair rent revised by the Crofters Commission on the first opportunity which the Act gives for that being done. Until such opportunity offers, the Crofters Commission may not under the Act have power to interfere. But, if not common knowledge, it is at least generally supposed that on the joint application by both parties, or even on the application of the landlord, they, the Commissioners, frequently do settle and regulate such matters, generally at inconsiderable cost and in a quite satisfactory manner.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Lord Adam desires me to say that he concurs in the result of the judgment proposed.

The pursuer, however, moved the Court to sist the action to enable him to preserve arrestments on the dependence till he should raise and follow forth an action in England. 1ST DIVISION.
LdStormonth-Darling.

ATKINSON & WOOD, tailors, carrying on business at 63 English Street, Carlisle, brought an action in the Court of Session against Mrs Eugenie Fairweather or Mackintosh, wife of and residing with the Reverend John Mackintosh at 77 Scotland Road, Stanwix, near Carlisle, and the said Reverend John Mackintosh for his interest, The pursuers concluded for payment of £48, 5s. 2½d., being the price of goods purchased from them by the defender Mrs Mackintosh. Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem had been used against the defender Mrs Mackintosh.

The defender Mrs Mackintosh lodged defences, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction; and (2) Forum non conveniens.

The pursuers used arrestments on the dependence of the action.

The pursuers averred that the defender Mrs Mackintosh was possessed of considerable separate estate in Scotland.

No action to recover the debt sued for had been brought in England.

On 18th January 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties and considered the cause, in respect the first plea in law for the defender is not insisted in, repels the same: Sustains her second plea in law: Sists further procedure for six months, in order to give the pursuers time, if so advised, to raise and follow forth an action in the English Courts, and grants leave to reclaim."

Mar. 17, 1905.
Atkinson & Wood v. Mackintosh.

The defender Mrs Mackintosh reclaimed, and argued;—The plea of forum non conveniens having been sustained, the action must be dismissed.[1] If the pursuers raised an action in England and obtained decree, their proper course was to proceed under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.[2] They could not get decree conform in this action. There was no conclusion for decree conform. The arrestments used on the dependence would be of no use. The case of Hawkins v. Wedderburn[3] was distinguishable. There an action had already been instituted in England, and the action in Scotland was insisted in solely for the purpose of attaching heritable estate in Scotland pending the decision of the action which was proceeding in England. Here the object of the action was to have the case tried in Scotland, and there was no action at present depending in England.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—An action should only be dismissed on the plea of forum non conveniens if the pursuer had as ample a remedy in the foreign Court.[4] It was impossible on the dependence of an action in England to arrest funds in Scotland. A pursuer who had competently raised an action in England, was entitled to bring an action here on the same matter for the purpose of attaching funds in Scotland.[5] The object of having this case sisted and not dismissed was to impound the funds till the pursuer obtained a decree in an action to be brought in England. It made no difference whether the English action had been brought already or not, if the position was that the defender had funds in Scotland, but the question on the merits had to be tried in England, as the pursuers now conceded here that it must be. The principle was that a party was entitled to raise and keep up an action for the purpose of securing ultimate payment, although the question on the merits had to be tried elsewhere.[6] In the case of Hawkins,[3] diligence on the dependence was not used immediately on the bringing of the action. The pursuer here might still bring an action for decree conform. He would require no further arrestment to enable him to satisfy his decree when he got it. If he got a decree he could bring a furthcoming on the arrestments on the dependence of this action. In the case of Sim v. Robinow,[7] there was no question as to arrestments.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of a firm of tailors of Carlisle against a Mrs Mackintosh, residing at Stanwix, near Carlisle, to recover a sum of money, the price of goods supplied by them. Among other pleas taken by the defender is one of "Forum non conveniens," and that plea has been sustained. The case would no doubt have been dismissed by the Lord Ordinary, but that meanwhile the pursuers had arrested on the dependence of the action, and asked that it should not be dismissed but sisted. The avowed object was to have the advantage of such arrestment at a later stage of their proceedings, and was in order that, when it should be necessary to put in force the decree to be obtained in the action about to be raised in England, the defender's property here should be found intact. As authority for this position we were referred to the case of Hawkins v. Wedderburn,[1] a decision of the whole Court, and also that of Fordyce v. Bridges[2] in the same volume of the reports. If this case were precisely on all-fours with that of Hawkins,[1] I would be of opinion that, looking to the great weight of the opinions of the minority in that case, this one should be sent to a larger Court in order that that decision should be reconsidered, in view of the difference created by the passing of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.[3] But this case is not on all-fours with that of Hawkins,[1] for there there was in England a living case. Here there is none. Here it is only said that the pursuers intend raising an action in England. Now, I am not prepared to push the case of Hawkins[1] one step further than it goes. I think that the defender's plea of "Forum non conveniens" having been sustained, the action should be dismissed, and I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against.

Lord Kinnear.—Two preliminary pleas are stated for the defender. The first is "No jurisdiction." The second is "Forum non conveniens," which is equivalent to "Forum non competens," and it means that of two Courts having jurisdiction, it is proper that the case should be tried in one and not in the other. There is no doubt as to the first plea. Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were laid on in respect of which this Court undoubtedly has jurisdiction. But it is now finally decided that the other plea has been rightly sustained, and that the action ought not to proceed here, but in a Court in England, which is the proper forum both of the pursuers and the defender. It would seem to follow of logical necessity that the action should be dismissed. It has been decided that it is not to go on in this Court. I cannot see why, if it has been decided that the action is not to be sustained, it should nevertheless be kept alive in order to give the pursuer the benefit of a diligence in security which the law of the forum to which he is bound to resort will not allow him. The law and practice of this country enables the pursuer to arrest on the dependence of an action in this Court, but if this Court refuses to entertain the action, I know of no authority and no legal principle to suppert an arrestment in Scotland on the dependence of an action in a foreign Court.

I should therefore have had no difficulty in dismissing the action, and I understand that your Lordship in the chair would have had none either, if it had not been for the case of Hawkins.[1] I agree that if that case were directly applicable we should be bound either to follow it or to send this case to seven Judges to consider whether the case of Hawkins[1] is still a binding authority in view of the provisions of the Judgments Extension Act.[3] I should certainly not be inclined to decide that question without sending it to be considered by a larger Court. But the decision in Hawkins[1] is not directly in point. The plea taken there was not "Forum non conveniens," but "Lis alibi pendens." That plea could not possibly be stated in the present case, because there is no action depending in England, and besides proceedings in a foreign Court do not constitute lis alibi pendens in the proper sense. The cases are therefore distinguishable. I think the pursuers are entitled to found upon the reasoning of the majority of the Judges in Hawkins[1] in support of their contention that an action may be entertained for the purpose of authorising diligence, although it ought not to be entertained on the merits. But there is a difference between the authority of judicial reasoning on a point on which judgment has not actually passed, and the authority of a decision. The decision is binding upon us, but I am not prepared to hold that the Court is bound by all that was said in the course of delivering judgment.

LORD PEARSON (read by the Lord President).—This is an action on a contract between two parties, both of whom are resident and (so far as appears) domiciled in England. The contract sued on was made and performed in England; the law applicable to that contract is admittedly the law of England; and I read the pursuers' averments as implying that there is no obstacle to their having the case tried in England in the County Court (for which it seems well adapted), or, if they prefer it, in the High Court of Justice.

It is not disputed that jurisdiction in this Court has been well founded by arrestment. But the defender pleads "forum non conveniens," and the Lord Ordinary has sustained that plea, and sisted procedure for six months to give the pursuers time, if so advised, to raise and follow forth an action in the English Courts. The defender objects to the sist of procedure, and maintains that, as the plea of forum non conveniens has been sustained, the action should be dismissed. Dismissal is perhaps the course most usually adopted when that plea is sustained, but the procedure to be followed is to a certain extent in the discretion of the Court.

In the present case the pursuers, in supporting the six months' sist granted by the Lord Ordinary, rely (1) upon the fact that the separate estate belonging to the defender as a married woman is in Scotland, in the hands of two trustees who are solicitors in Aberdeen, and (2) on two cases reported in the 4th volume of Dunlop, Hawkins[1] and Fordyce,[2] which they say are authorities for keeping this action in Court until the pursuers have raised their action in England and have obtained decree in it. The avowed purpose is, that the pursuers, by arresting on the dependence of the present action, may secure a fund to answer the English decree for payment, if and when they obtain it. I know of no authority in the law in Scotland which goes the length of sustaining a summons in this Court, raised avowedly for that limited purpose, unless the action or suit is already in dependence in England at the time the Scotch action is raised. Certainly, neither Hawkins[1] nor Fordyce[2] is an authority for that proposition. In the latter case, the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, which may be regarded as expressing the doctrine at its highest, distinctly says that it is the dependence of the suit in England which gives jurisdiction in Scotland, to the effect of securing the defender's property for the ultimate safety of the pursuer. For my part, while giving all due obedience to the principle laid down by a majority of the whole Court in Hawkins,[1] I am not prepared to take a step further in the same direction, which we should be doing if we were to sustain the present action to the limited effect of enabling the pursuers to secure funds to answer a decree to be pronounced in an English proceeding not yet begun. On reading the Lord Ordinary's note in the case of Hawkins,[1] I was under the impression that the case of M'Master,[2] to which he refers, was an instance to the contrary, as the first of the two actions there was raised in Scotland. But on a perusal of that case it appears that it differed entirely from the case now in hand, and really has no bearing on the question now raised. In particular, there was no question at all as to arrestment on the dependence.

I am therefore for dismissing the action.

(Scotland) Act, 1892,[1] and the Town Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900,[2] for the purpose of having Prestwick formed into a police burgh. The petition was granted, and a council was elected in terms of the Acts mentioned and constituted in November 1903.

The right to elect a council having thus passed from the freemen, questions arose between them and the new corporation as to their rights in the burgh territory.

In April 1904, John Boyd and others, freemen of Prestwick, on behalf of themselves and the thirty-six freemen of the burgh of Barony of Prestwick, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Ayr against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Prestwick, in which the petitioners prayed the Court:—"To find and declare that the petitioners have a private and patrimonial right in the property of the burgh of Barony of Prestwick, and the whole revenues derived therefrom, and in particular (1st) . . . that the whole revenues derived from the feu-duties formerly administered by the burgh of Barony of Prestwick for behoof of the petitioners, together with the whole casualties of superiority effeiring thereto, are the property of the petitioners, that it is a private and patrimonial right vested in the petitioners, and that they are the sole parties beneficially interested therein: (2d) . . . That the whole minerals underneath the Prestwick freedom lands, and reserved to the freemen in the feu-rights and dispositions of the Prestwick freedom lands, are the property of the petitioners, and that it is a private and patrimonial right vested in the thirty-six freemen of Prestwick as joint owners of the said minerals: (3d) . . . That the whole minerals underneath the Prestwick lands other than freedom lands, so far as reserved to the burgh in the feu-rights and dispositions in favour of the feuars, are vested in the petitioners, and that it is a private and patrimonial right, and that the petitioners are the sole parties beneficially interested therein: (4th) . . . That the burgh hall of Prestwick, which was erected by the petitioners by private subscription, is the sole property of the petitioners as joint owners thereof:" and (5), (6), (7), and (8) that certain parcels of land described in the prayer were "the property of the petitioners."

It appeared from the condescendence that the subjects in question were of greater value than £50 by the year, or £1000.

The petitioners founded upon section 27 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55).[3]

The respondents lodged defences, and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No jurisdiction.

On 13th October 1904, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that, as appears from the petition and condescendence lodged for the pursuers . . . the value of the heritable subjects in dispute in the present action largely exceeds 'the sum of £50 by the year, or £1000 value': Finds in law that, in terms of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877,[4] section 8 (1), the Sheriff Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the present action, and that the same is incompetent in this Court: Accordingly sustains the second plea in law stated for the defenders, and dismisses the action," &c.

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The questions raised by the petition were just such questions as were contemplated by section 27 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.[1] Such questions generally involved property of small value, but in any case the rights of all parties were adequately safeguarded by the right of appeal. The rights and privileges referred to in the section did not require to be rights and privileges which had been exercised by the electors "as such." It might be that the word "exercised" was not quite accurately used, but as used it was applied to "rights" as well as "privileges," and as applied to rights it must mean "enjoyed."

Argued for the respondents;—This was really a declarator of a heritable right of property. Such a question was not contemplated by section 27 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. The rights claimed were not rights "exercised" by the electors of the burgh of barony as such. The use of the word "exercised" shewed that the section did not apply to such rights as were claimed here. Further, the claim was not that the property in question should be held by the burgh for behoof of the freemen, but that it belonged in property to the freemen themselves. It was highly improbable that Parliament should have intended to give the Sheriff privative jurisdiction as to all questions of heritable right arising as the result of the adoption of the Burgh Police Act, 1892.

At advising,—

Lord M'Laren.—The case raises some interesting questions as to the rights of the freemen of this ancient burgh of barony, in relation to the burgh property. But the only question with which we are concerned is that of jurisdiction. The action was instituted in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire. The Sheriff-substitute by his interlocutor of 13th October 1904 (appealed from) has held that the Sheriff Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the action, and I (in common with your Lordships who heard the case) am of opinion that this finding is well founded, and that the action was rightly dismissed.

The argument for the appellants is founded on the 27th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,[1] which provides (subsec. 1)—(His Lordship quoted the subsection).

Now, it is common ground that by the operation of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, the right to elect a Town-Council was taken away from the freemen of Prestwick, and that in the execution of that Act and the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, Prestwick has been formed into a Police Burgh of the ordinary type. The question then remains whether the rights which are sought to be established in favour of the freemen by the declaratory conclusions of this petition are rights or privileges of the nature indicated in the 27th section, and appropriated by that section to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?

The conclusions of the petition are (1) that the revenues derived from feu-duties and casualties of superiority "are the property of the petitioners"; (2) that the minerals underneath the Prestwick freedom lands "are the property of the petitioners," as joint owners thereof; (3) that the minerals underneath the Prestwick lands, other than freedom lands, "are vested in the petitioners; (4) that the town hall is the "property of the petitioners," as joint owners, and (5, 6, 7, and 8) that the parcels of land there described are the property of the petitioners. The 9th and only other conclusion is a conclusion in the usual form for expenses.

The petition is then neither more nor less than a declaratory action to establish heritable rights of property in the persons of the thirty-six freemen of Prestwick and their heirs, against the present administrators of that property, viz., the Town-Council of Prestwick.

It may be that the freemen in a competent action will be able to prove their right to these estates, which, according to the Sheriff-substitute's note are of very great value, but I do not find in the language of the 27th section evidence of the intention of the Legislature to transfer the decision of questions of heritable right from the ordinary Courts to a Court of summary jurisdiction, whose methods of procedure are left wholly undefined. The questions to be decided summarily by the Sheriff are described in the 27th section as disputes as to "whether any right or privilege exercised" by the old electors is a public or a private right. I do not think that any lawyer or landed proprietor in speaking of the purchase of a mineral estate or estate of superiority would describe it as the exercise of a right or privilege, and I therefore conclude that Parliament in using these words meant to refer to franchises or privileges, and not to property.

It is not necessary to elaborate the point, because it is only a question of the meaning of ordinary words in a section of an Act of Parliament which may not be quite clear, but are certainly not technical. But I desire to point out that there is more than mere form at stake in this question. If this declaratory action is rightly instituted in the Sheriff Court, then the findings of this Court on questions of fact will be final, but in an action of declarator raised in the Court of Session our findings in fact would not be final. It is plain enough that the rights claimed by the petitioners must depend to some extent on fact, and the defenders have a legitimate interest to insist that the case shall not come before the Court in such a form as may interfere with their right of appeal. I therefore suggest that we should dismiss this appeal and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT not having been appointed at the date of the hearing took no part in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in terms of the findings in fact and in law contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 13th October 1904: Affirm the said interlocutor, and of new dismiss the action, and decern: Find the pursuers liable, jointly and severally, in the expenses of the appeal."

Cadell v. Allan.

HENRY MOUBRAY CADELL, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Clyde, K.C.—Constable.

CHARLES EDWARD ALLAN AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Campbell, K.C.—Chree.

Church—Glebe—Designation of Glebe—Excambion of Glebe—Effect of Decree of Presbytery sanctioning excambion of Glebe.—Where a glebe is excambed the title to the new glebe flows from the excamber, and the decree of the Presbytery completing the title is not a judicial determination, but merely gives the sanction of the Presbytery to the transaction, and impresses the land given to the minister with the character and status of a glebe.

Property—Title—Competition of Title—Glebe—Boundary—Foreshore—Minerals under Foreshore.—In exchange for an old glebe, a new glebe bounded by the sea was acquired by excambion in 1817. The new glebe had originally formed part of a portion of the barony of Grange, known as the 24 acres.

In 1613 the 24 acres bounded by the sea had been feued by the proprietor of Grange to Bruce, the coal being reserved by the granter. In 1643 the granter obtained a Crown charter of resignation which contained a grant of the coal in the foreshore as a separate estate. In 1673 the proprietor of Grange, in consideration of a money payment, granted a charter of novodamus conveying the 24 acres (without reservation of the coal) to Bruce's successor, who in the same year took infeftment upon a precept contained in the charter.

In 1904 the right of the minister to the coal in the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe was challenged by the proprietor of Grange in a process of interdict brought by him against the minister's mineral tenants.

The complainer founded on the Crown charter of resignation of 1643, which contained a grant of the minerals in the 24 acres as a separate tenement, and contended that the charter of novodamus of 1673 merely gave of new what was given in the feu-contract of 1613.

The mineral tenants in answer founded on the novodamus of 1673 as conveying the coal in the 24 acres from the proprietor of Grange to Bruce's successor.

Held that the charter of novodamus of 1673 included the coal, and contained a valid grant by the proprietor of Grange of the 24 acres, without reservation, and that therefore the proprietor of Grange had no title to challenge the minister's right to the coal in the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe.

1st DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 30th March 1904 Henry Moubray Cadell, proprietor of the lands and barony of Grange, in the parish of Borrowstounness and Carriden, Linlithgowshire, brought a note of suspension and interdict against Charles Edward Allan, Stormont Castle, Strandtown, Belfast, and Robert Thomson Walker, mining engineer, Borrowstounness, who were the tenants under a mineral lease granted in 1902 by the minister of the parish of Carriden, with consent of the Presbytery, of the minerals in the glebe.

The prayer of the note craved the Court to interdict the respondents "from sinking pits or mines into, and from working, removing, or otherwise interfering with, the coal situated beneath the foreshore ex adverso of the minister's glebe of the parish of Carriden, in the county of Linlithgow."

The complainer averred that he held a continuous series of titles to the lands and barony of Grange, dating from a charter of resignation and novodamus granted by King James VI. in favour of John Hamilton, eldest son of Mr John Hamilton of Grange, dated 15th December 1615.

No copy or extract of this Crown charter was in existence, but the signature signed by the King at Newmarket on 15th December 1615, and registered in the Register of Signatures on 26th December 1615, contained a grant in favour of the said John Hamilton, his heirs and assignees, inter alia, of "all and sindrie coillis alsueill gryt as small now being or that sall happin to be fund and win in onie tyme cuming in the sey alsueill within as without the flude thairof perteneing to his Majestie and to the of his hienes croune be the actis of Parliament & lawis of this realme quhaireuir the samen ar or may be fund foiranent the haill boundis meithis and merchis of the landis of Grange Murehouss Littill Carriden and Stakkis with thair pertinentis or onie pairt or pairts thereof perteneing to the said Johne Hamiltoun lyand within the Srefdome. of Linlithgow with speall. and full power and libertie and preuiledge to the said Johne Hamiltoun and his foirsaids To serche seik and caus be serchit socht fund and win coil heuchis in the sea ane or mae alsueill within as without the sey flude foiranent the boundis of the landis abonespeit. with the pertinentis and to brek the grund for that effect in sic pairtis as thay sall think expedient and to use all ingeynis neidfull for wyning of the said Coilheuchis and thairupon and upon the haill coillis gryt and small to be win thairin to dispone at thair pleasr. in all tyme cuming."

The complainer further produced a precept under the Signet for the Crown charter of 1615 in favour of John Hamilton, dated 15th December 1615, and recorded in the Register of the Privy Seal, which contained a description in Latin similar to that in the signature.

An extract was also produced from the Crown Treasury Books, shewing payment of composition on John Hamilton's entry to Grange.

The complainer further produced a Crown charter of resignation, confirmation, and novodamus, dated 21st August 1643, which confirmed, inter alia, a previous Crown charter erecting the lands of Grange into a barony, and contained a grant of the coals ex adverso of the lands of Grange, Muirhouse, and Little Carriden," "within as well as without the seaflood."

It was admitted that the words "ex adverso of Muirhouse and Little Carriden" covered the portion of foreshore in dispute.

The complainer averred that he and his predecessors had proved and worked the coal beneath the foreshore ex adverso of his lands from time immemorial, but he did not aver that he had proved or worked the coal under the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe.

The respondents averred that successive ministers had been in use to exercise all right of ownership over the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe. "In particular, they have sold and used gravel therefrom, and constructed and used saltpans, and kept boats thereon."

The original glebe of Carriden was designed by the Presbytery of Linlithgow in 1629 out of the lands of Grange. In 1630 the Presbytery sanctioned an excambion of the glebe for other lands of Grange. In 1650 the Presbytery designed grass lands for the minister. In 1817 another excambion of the glebe was sanctioned by a decree of Presbytery, which set forth that "the sea is to be considered the boundary of the new glebe on the north." The excamber on this occasion was Sir George Hope of Carriden, and though, as it turned out, he was not at that time proprietor of the lands given in exchange, he subsequently acquired them in 1833 by a contract of excambion, with entry as at Martinmas 1817, with the true proprietor, the Duke of Hamilton.

The history of these various transactions with regard to the glebe is fully set out in the opinion of the Lord President.

Cadell v. Allan.

The respondents, with the view of shewing that the complainer had no title to the minerals as a separate estate, founded upon (1) a feu-contract dated 3d March 1613, by which Sir John Hamilton of Grange feued to Sir George Bruce of Carnock, 24 acres of arable land of Muirhouse and Little Carriden (from which the present glebe was got by the excambion of 1817), which were described as bounded by the sea on the north;* and (2) a charter of confirmation and novodamus of the same 24 acres, dated 11th July 1673, and granted by John Hamilton in favour of Sir Walter Seaton, who had come to possess the 24 acres. This charter of novodamus bore to be granted for a money payment and other good causes and considerations. It contained a grant of new of the 24 acres without any reservation of the coal, but it contained the clause quoted below,† which was founded upon by the complainer as importing a reservation of the coal by reference to the feu-contract of 1613.

The charter contained a precept of sasine, upon which infeftment was taken.

It was admitted that the new glebe obtained by excambion in 1817 was taken out of the "24 acres of arable land of Muirhouse and Little Carriden."

The respondents also founded upon a Crown charter, dated 1629, in favour of the Marquis of Hamilton, which contained a grant of the coals ex adverso of the whole barony of Carriden, of which the lands of Grange, Muirhouse, and Little Carriden, originally formed a part. The respondents were, however, in the opinion of the Court, unable to connect themselves with this title.

The respondents also relied upon a disposition of the 24 acres, dated in 1736, by John Hamilton of Grange, in favour of Robert Mirrie, but the Court was of opinion that this disposition conveyed the superiority of the lands only.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The complainer having, under his titles, the sole and exclusive right to the coal beneath the foreshore and bed of the sea ex adverso of Carriden glebe, is entitled to interdict, as craved. (2) The respondents having unlawfully interfered with the complainer's rights, interdict should be pronounced as concluded for, with expenses. (3) The prima facie right to the coal in question being in the complainer, interim interdict should be granted.

No. 110.

Mar. 17, 1905. Cadell v. Allan.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) All parties not called. (3) The complainer's statements are irrelevant. (6) The respondents' working of the coal under the foreshore being in virtue of a lease from the owners thereof, the note should be refused.

A proof was allowed, and led. The facts disclosed at the proof with regard to possession of the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe by successive ministers of Carriden related mainly to the removal of stones, gravel, and sand, for various purposes connected with the glebe, and the receipt of payments by the ministers for sand and gravel removed by other persons.

On 16th December 1903 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the second plea in law for the respondents; finds that the complainer has not proved that he has right to the coal beneath the foreshore of Carriden glebe; repels the pleas in law for the complainer; sustains the sixth plea in law for the respondents; refuses the note, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.—This is an action brought by Mr Henry Moubray Cadell, proprietor of Grange, concluding for interdict against the respondents working the coal beneath the foreshore of the glebe of the parish of Carriden, which is situated on the south side of the Forth, a short way below Bo'ness. The complainer does not claim the foreshore itself, but only the coal under it. In the suspension he also claims the coals under the bed of the sea, but the respondents stated that they had no lease of these coals, and had never intimated any intention of working them, and, in these circumstances, the complainer does not now press for interdict with regard to these coals. The respondents are lessees of the minister of Carriden and plead in his right; so that the question in the case is whether the minerals under the foreshore of or opposite to the glebe belong to Mr Henry Moubray Cadell under a title of property or to the minister as a portion of the glebe. The question is, to my mind, very difficult, and the title put forward by the complainer is involved and intricate.

"There seem to be two questions—(1) as to the minister's title, which it will be convenient to take first as being the simpler, and (2) as to the complainer's title.

"The minister's right, on which the case of his lessees the respondents depends, rests, of course, on the deed of designation of the glebe. The glebe of Carriden was designed in 1630, but the glebe so designed is not the present glebe, because an excambion or new designation was effected in 1817, on which new designation this question depends. After stating the heritors present or represented, and among them the ancestor of the complainer, and setting forth the procedure, the minutes of the presbytery bear that certain persons duly appointed had valued 'the minister's glebe at Carriden' (the old glebe) 'proposed to be given in exchange for the lands of Cuffabouts, &c., belonging to Sir George Hope of Carriden' (the new glebe), that they had found them of the same value, and that the presbytery had decreed that the old glebe should belong to Sir George Hope, 'and that the glebe shall consist of the parks immediately to the north and east of the church and churchyard of Carriden, the park lying to the south of the same usually called Cuffabouts, the park lying between the same and Pease-

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The complainer's title to the barony of Grange was unimpeachable. The Crown charter of 1615 was not in existence, but the signature and precept for the charter had been produced, as well as the receipt for a payment of composition. There had also been produced a Crown charter of 1643. These titles contained a grant per expressum of the coal under the foreshore ex adverso of the barony lands, and it was admitted that the glebe originally formed part of the barony. The complainer and his predecessors had worked coal under the foreshore in different parts of the barony, though not ex adverso of the glebe. No doubt a portion of the barony, known as the "24 acres," had been feued out in 1613, but the coal had been specially reserved and formed into a separate tenement.[1] The absence of an express reservation of coal in the charter of novodamus of 1673 could not affect the previous reservation,[2] but in any event the clause [3] in the charter of 1673 hill on the south, the triangular piece of ground lying between them and the road to Linlithgow on the west, amounting in all to 11 acres and 367 decimal parts of an acre, which shall be enjoyed by the present minister of Carriden and his successors in all time coming.' The minute, at the end of it, bears, 'It is at the same time expressly and particularly to be understood, though there is a dyke now erected between the northermost park and the road along the shore, that the sea is to be considered as the boundary of the new glebe on the north, and the minister of Carriden for the time being to be entitled to all rights and privileges connected with the same.'

"Since that date the glebe so designed has been regarded and dealt with as the glebe of the parish, and the former glebe has been regarded as having ceased to be so. No one has questioned the designation, and I think it is not questioned now.

"It may be that the proceedings in carrying through this designation were blundered. It bears to proceed on an exchange between the minister and Sir George Hope; but it does not appear from the titles produced that Sir George was proprietor of the lands stated to be excambed. These lands seem to have belonged to the Duke of Hamilton. This mistake passed unnoticed for a considerable time, but when it was discovered a contract of excambion was entered into between the Duke of Hamilton and Sir George Hope, apparently for the purpose, and certainly with the effect, of rectifying this mistake, whereby the Duke conveyed to Sir George the lands which had been declared to form the glebe. This was no doubt a considerable irregularity; but still I think it must be held to have been corrected by this excambion, whereby any flaw in the title to the new glebe, if there was one, was corrected, and, as the procedure passed without objection, I think it must be held that the glebe was effectually constituted. It has not been challenged, and no proposal has been made to attempt to reduce the proceedings, and I therefore regard it as the duly erected glebe of Carriden, and no question remains except as to its construction and effect.

"I understand that the measured space, 11·367 acres, does not include any part of the foreshore, and that if the foreshore be added it will be in addition to that measurement, and the complainer maintains that it cannot be supposed that it was intended in that way to increase, probably by as much again, the extent of the glebe; but I do not think that the mere imported a reservation of the coal by reference to the charter of 1613. The complainer's title to the coal in question was therefore sufficient until someone with a better title appeared.[1] The respondent's only title was the glebe. A glebe consisted of arable and grass lands, and it was incompetent to design foreshore or the coal under it as a glebe.[2] It was not competent to design a servitude[3] nor a right of salmon-fishing.[4] In Gilmour v. Sutherland[5] the circumstances were special, and no designation was produced. Further, a decree of Presbytery sanctioning an excambion had not the effect of an original designation. The decree merely impressed the excambed land with the character of a glebe, and confirmed the excamber's title to the old glebe. In particular the decree could not take anything except from a willing granter, nor could it transfer property which did not belong to the excamber.[6] In the present case the coal under the foreshore did not belong to the excamber, because it had been reserved in the addition of the foreshore can be held as a material addition to the extent of the glebe. It was truly (apart from the minerals) a piece of waste ground of very slight value, and the addition of it would have added very little to the value of the glebe but for the minerals. But I do not think it open to me to speculate on the intention of the designers of the glebe. I must give effect to the express, distinct, and emphatic expression of their intention, that in any case the sea is to be the boundary of the new glebe, and I think it must therefore follow that the foreshore is of necessity included in the glebe, because it is well settled that a boundary by the sea includes the foreshore.

"Whether the minerals under the foreshore were included in the glebe is a different question. But I am of opinion, on the whole, that they must be included. Probably little was known about them at the date of the designation, and nothing is said about them in the minute or the valuation. The glebe above the sea was valued without taking the minerals into account, and I can see no sufficient reason for treating the minerals in the foreshore differently. It may be that it was a piece of good fortune for the minister to find the minerals in the foreshore, or under his glebe, but I think they were part of the glebe which was designated, and that the designation cannot be interfered with.

"I am therefore of opinion that the minerals under the foreshore of the glebe are a portion of the glebe.

"If the minister have right to the minerals under the foreshore as part of his glebe, and if the designation of the glebe is not reduced, I am disposed to think that it must receive effect, and that it affords a sufficient defence to the respondents whatever the complainer's title may be.

"But without going into any close examination of the numerous titles feu-contract of 1613. The respondents were unable to connect themselves with the Crown charter of 1629,[1] and the disposition in favour of Robert Mirrie[2] carried nothing but the superiority.[3] The respondents had not proved possession even of the surface of the foreshore by the minister, but in any event possession of the surface could not give a prescriptive right to the coal beneath the foreshore in competition with an express right to the coal as a separate tenement.[4]

Argued for the respondents;—The minister of Carriden had a good title to the foreshore and the coal under it. The terms of the designation of 1817 included the foreshore,[5] and in any event possession of the foreshore by successive ministers since 1817 had been proved.[6] The right of a minister to his glebe extended a cœlo usque ad centrum. It was competent to design foreshore as part of a glebe as well as coals and minerals[7] and salmon-fishings.[8] The minister's right to the glebe was not affected by the fact that the decree of 1817 was not an original designation, but followed upon an excambion.[9] The which have been produced, the print of which I have gone over several times, I am at least not satisfied that they make out the complainer's case. In the first place, I am not satisfied that they express a title to the minerals under the foreshore as different and separate from a title to the foreshore. I am not satisfied that, in any case, they give a title to minerals apart from the lands under which they lie. If that be so, then I do not think that they give a title to the foreshore opposite the glebe or the minerals under it (the point now in question). Clearly they do not, because it clearly enough appears that that foreshore belonged to the Duke of Hamilton. I do not discover that the lands of Grange, Muirhouse, Little Carriden, or Stacks formed part of the lands designed as glebe, or that any part of the foreshore of the new glebe ever formed part of the foreshore of Grange, Muirhouse, Little Carriden, or Stacks.

"I observe that 24 acres, part of the lands of Muirhouse and Little Carriden, to which so many of the titles refer, and the bearing of which on the case was not clear to me, I say I observe that these 24 acres were acquired by the Duke of Hamilton in 1742, and were, I suppose, the lands or part of the lands given in excambion to the minister on the occasion of the designation. But I cannot find any satisfactory proof that Mr Cadell was ever proprietor of any part of the lands given in excambion or of the foreshore, which then became part of the glebe, or of the minerals under that foreshore."

designation had remained unchallenged for eighty years, and the complainer's objection, now made for the first time, that the coal under the foreshore did not belong to the excamber, came too late.[1] The excamber had, however, a right to the coal. The reservation in the feu-contract of 1613 was ineffectual for want of proper specification, and was merely a personal right which was not inserted in the charter of novodamus of 1673.[2] In any event the novodamus of 1673 carried the coal, as it had not been reserved.[3] Further, the complainer had not produced a good title to the coal. The charter of 1615 had not been produced, and the complainer must prove the tenor of that deed if he desired to found on it.[4] As regards the Crown charter of 1643, founded upon by the complainer, the coal had already been given out before that date to the Marquis of Hamilton by the Crown charter of 1629.[5] The disposition of 1736 by John Hamilton of Grange in favour of Robert Mirrie[6] also carried the coal.[7] The fact that the complainer had worked coal under the foreshore in other parts of the barony was of no avail. The coal in question had been taken out of the barony, and a barony title could not cover as a pertinent anything outside the barony.[8]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of suspension and interdict directed by Henry Moubray Cadell, proprietor of the estate of Grange, against two gentlemen who have sunk coal pits in the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe of Carriden, in the county of Linlithgow, in which he seeks to have them interdicted from continuing to work the coal underneath the foreshore.

The complainer rests his title to object upon an express grant of the coals ex adverso of the lands of which the glebe forms part, which he deduces through a long series of titles, commencing, as he alleges, with a Crown charter of 1615. He does not allege any property in the foreshore itself, nor does he say that he has ever worked the coal at this particular place, although he does say that the express title to the coal is erected with other subjects into the barony of Grange, and that at other places of the barony of Grange he worked the coals therein.

The respondents produce a lease from the minister, with consent of the Presbytery, of coals lying under the foreshore ex adverso of and forming, as they allege, part of the glebe, but they do not allege that, prior to their own workings, there has been any working of the coal by the minister or his predecessors.

The Lord Ordinary has refused the note of suspension, and it is against his judgment that the present reclaiming note is taken. The effective part of the Lord Ordinary's judgment consists in sustaining the respondents' sixth plea in law, which is in the following terms: "The respondents' working of the coal under the foreshore being in virtue of a lease from the owners thereof the note should be refused." It is true that the Lord Ordinary in the course of his note also says that he is not satisfied that the complainer has made out a title which would include the coal at all, and that he in consequence repels the whole of the complainer's pleas. But he does not go with any minuteness into the progress of the titles produced by the complainer, merely contenting himself with the statement that he is not satisfied that the complainer has on this matter made out his case. I think, therefore, that I am not doing him injustice when I say that the true ground of his judgment must be sought in the following passage:—"I am therefore of opinion that the minerals under the foreshore of the glebe are a portion of the glebe. If the minister have right to the minerals under the foreshore as part of his glebe, and if the designation of the glebe is not reduced, I am disposed to think that it must receive effect, and that it affords a sufficient defence to the respondents, whatever the complainer's title may be."

Before I proceed to examine this conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, it is necessary that I should set forth in some detail the circumstances connected with the history of the glebe in question.

On page sixty-four of the joint print of documents there are to be found sundry excerpts from the minutes of the Presbytery of Linlithgow, which shew that on 16th July 1628, Mr Andro Keir, the minister of the church of Carriden, "craved a visitation and presented before the brethrein ane precept for designation off his manse and glebe from the Archbishop direct to the moderator, Mr Jhone Gibbesonn and Mr Thomas Spitall." The designation was duly appointed to take place on the 24th July, and accordingly on the 24th July we have a minute detailing the proceedings therein observed.

They were of a most formal character. After a sermon which treated of the duty and dignity of ministers, Mr Andro Keir was duly examined as to his doctrines, discipline, and conversation. These matters having apparently been found satisfactory, there was then produced a procuratory from the Archbishop. Upon this procuratory being read, public inquiry was made in presence of the whole gentlemen of the parish who were present as to whether anyone could testify "whether there was any vicarage or parsonage lands within the parish, or where any glebe appertaining to the kirk of old did lie." No testimony to the effect that there existed any such old glebe or church lands presently belonging to the benefice being forthcoming, the brethren signified to the gentlemen present that, according to the Act of Parliament and the precept direct from their Ordinar, they would take a course for the designation of the said manse and glebe before the third Thursday of November next, and that upon the nearest kirk land. This "course" or investigation seems to have been duly made, and on 18th February 1629 the parishioners interested are again convened to hear the formal designation of the glebe which had been selected. On 4th March 1629 we have this entry, "This day ane report is maid of the designation of the gleib off Cariddenn out off the landis off Grange neirest to the said kirk."

The precise situation of the glebe thus formally designed in 1629 we do not know. It must have been designed out of kirk lands for, as I shall have occasion to point out, it was not possible to design a glebe out of any other. The kirk lands which were chosen were those which were nearest to the kirk and seem to have been part of the lands of Grange. It is, however, immaterial what was the precise position of that glebe because of the events which are now to be detailed. Following the excerpts from the Presbytery records, we find that, on 3d March 1630, John Gibson in name of Sir John Hamilton of Grange proceeds to offer certain other lands of his, which he represents as being much nearer and contiguous to the church of Carriden than the lands originally designed, and he intimated that, if it was found that lands which he was now offering in exchange for the lands originally designed were not of the same value, he would be willing to submit to the arbitration of three or four honest skilled men of the parish, who should add as much more to the lands he was presently offering as would make the two parcels of land equal in value. The lands thus offered by Sir John were obviously lands nearer, as he says, and more commodious for the minister, but not having been church lands could not have been designated under the Act of Parliament under the original designation. This offer was entertained by the brethren with the advice of the minister, and they accordingly ordered a disposition and resignation of so much land to be made ad remanentiam and presented to them, that they "after advice finding it expedient may design it, and that thereafter a letter of excambion be made and subscribed by the Archbishop in favour of the said Sir John." Accordingly, on 17th March 1630, we find that this disposition and resignation of 4 acres 3 roods of the land of Little Carriden belonging to Sir John Hamilton of Grange, subscribed by the said Sir John, the fiar of Grange, and Alexander Bruce of Alvath for his interest, who had a certain part of the lands in feu-farm, was presented to the brethren, and they, being contented and satisfied therewith, ordained the moderator, Mr John Gibson, conform to a commission given him by the Archbishop, to go down in the afternoon and to design the said 4 acres 3 roods of land for the manse and glebe to Mr Andrew Keir. Then, on the 31st of March, we have another entry, that the moderator had reported that he had designed according to order, and that instruments were taken in the hands of a notary-public, and that Mr Andrew Keir had been put in possession of the manse and glebe by John Henderson in name and behalf of Sir John Hamilton and Alexander Bruce, conform to a procuratory given to the said John Henderson, whereupon the said Andrew Keir took possession at the hands of the said notary.

The situation of the glebe thus designed, which it will be observed was out of the lands of Little Carriden, has been probably identified with fair accuracy by the complainer and respondents, but again I do not detain your Lordships upon this matter, it being immaterial in view of what follows. The glebe remained the glebe of the parish, but on p. 73 of the joint print we have another excerpt from the Presbytery Minutes, which shews that twenty years after, in the year 1650, proceedings were taken for designing grass for the minister, an Act of Parliament in the meantime having been passed which allowed the minister a provision of grass over and above his glebe. From what followed thereafter I think it highly probable that the grass was designed at some place contiguous to the glebe. So matters remained for nearly 200 years. Turning to p. 104 of the joint print, we find that on 16th October 1817, the Presbytery of Linlithgow again met to deal with yet another excambion of the glebe of Carriden. The excamber this time was Sir George Hope of Carriden; although, as afterwards turned out, he was, curiously enough, not the proprietor of the lands which he proposed to give. The Presbytery duly appointed arbiters in order to judge of the relative value of the lands proposed to be given in exchange for the old glebe, and we have the report of the arbiters on p. 105. From this it appears that the glebe, as it then existed, consisted of 9·916 acres. Seeing that the original glebe was only a little over four acres, it warrants, I think, the supposition I have made, that the minister's grass had been designed at a place contiguous to the glebe, and that the whole glebe came to be known as the glebe, without distinction between the originally excambed glebe and the minister's grass which was added to it. In exchange for this Sir George Hope proposed to give part of the lands of Cuffabouts. Cuffabouts, we know from the titles, was by this time the name by which that part of what had originally been the lands of Little Carriden was called. The portion to be given extended to 11·367 acres. The final finding of the Presbytery is on p. 105, and is in the following terms:—"The Presbytery . . . Decree as they hereby do and have decreed that the old glebe of Carriden shall belong to Sir George Hope, his successors and assignees, and that the glebe of Carriden shall consist of the parks immediately to the north and east of the church and churchyard of Carriden, the parts lying to the south of the same usually called Cuffabouts, the park lying between the same and Pease Hill on the south, the triangular piece of ground lying between them and the road to Linlithgow on the west, amounting in all to 11 acres 367 decimal parts, which shall be enjoyed by the present minister of Carriden and his successors in all time coming. It is at the same time expressly and particularly to be understood, though there is a dyke now erected between the northernmost park and the road along the shore, that the sea is to be considered the boundary of the new glebe on the north, and the minister of Carriden for the time being to be entitled to all rights and privileges connected with the same."

No more conveyancing followed on this so far as the minister was concerned, but it is admitted that the minister was thereafter admitted to possession of his new glebe, and that he has possessed the same ever since. The respondents say that this pronouncement of the Presbytery was a decree by a competent Court designing the glebe to the minister, which glebe is described as having a sea boundary on the north; that a sea boundary is in law a conveyance per expressum of the foreshore; and that such a designation operates as a conveyance, from all and sundry, of the lands included in the designation. They plead, therefore, that the designation of the lands took the lands not only from Hope, if he was truly the owner thereof, but also, for the matter of that, from Cadell of the Grange, who had been convened to the process, and who as a matter of fact was personally present in the earlier steps of it; and that accordingly, so long as that decree stands unreduced, there is nothing more to be said. They say further that the decree, having been pronounced in the year 1817, is long ago unassailable under the law of the negative prescription. This view has been taken by the Lord Ordinary. All through his note he speaks of this transaction as a designation of the glebe. He holds that as long as that designation remains unreduced it must receive effect, and that no one can contend that the minerals underneath the lands falling within the designation were not carried, because the designation itself proprio vigore took them from the owner in whose hands they were. This view dispenses with the necessity of any further inquiry into the titles either of the complainer, as forming a competing title, or the title of the excamber, to see whether he had any right to give what, upon a just construction of the boundary given in the designation, he was proposing to give.

Cadell v. Allan.

I am not satisfied that the case can be disposed of on what would be a very simple and easy ground. I think this view gives to the actings of the Presbytery a power and effect to which they are not entitled. But in order to consider this question it is, I think, necessary to examine with some care the series of statutes, by which Presbyteries in Scotland have power to design a glebe, and the light which is thrown by decisions upon those powers. The matter is dealt with by no fewer than seven statutes of the Scottish Parliament. They are conveniently collected, and the material provisions thereof set forth, in the well-known work of Mr Duncan on Parochial Ecclesiastical Laws. They may be said to be divided into two chapters—one from the Reformation down to 1644 and the other from 1644 down to 1663. In Pre-Reformation times the Church was amply provided with temporality of benefice. After the Reformation the claim of the Protestant clergy to succeed to the benefices of the Church was never admitted. And, accordingly, in the earlier of these statutes we find that the mischief, which was sought to be remedied, was the feuing out or letting on long leases of the manses and glebes, without making any provision for the incumbent who at the time was actually doing the work of the cure. The word "designation," which is first used in the Act of 1572, refers, not to the setting out of a glebe for the first time, but to the marking out by the Archbishop, Bishop, Superintendent, or Commissioner of four acres of land of the existing glebe lying contiguous to the manse to the said manse "if there be sa meikle."

It is quite certain that, up to 1644, the only source from which a glebe could be designed was church lands, although, if these church lands had in the meantime passed into other hands, the particular possessors for the time being were to be warned out. But in 1644 a new advance was made by legislation, and Presbyteries,—for this Act was passed during the second period of the temporary suppression of Episcopacy,—were given the power, where no glebe had been designed, or if designed had not been of the full quantity, to design a glebe of 4 acres of arable land, not only out of church lands but, if there were no church lands, out of whatever lands happened to be most commodious and nearest to the Parish Church and manse. It is perhaps well to note, as regards this Act, that in Mr Duncan's book there is an unfortunate misprint, the word "Kirk" in the excerpt from the Statute of 1644 being printed after the word "whatsoever" instead of the word "other," which is the proper word in the Statute. The other heritors of the parish, whose lands are not taken, are made liable proportionally to make recompense to those heritors out of whose lands the glebe has been designed. Up to this point there is no provision whatever for changing the glebe. Designation only takes place either if there is no glebe, or the glebe which is in existence is not of the sufficient extent of 4 acres. In 1649, it is true, another Act was passed which provided that, where glebes were far distant from the manses so that they could not be conveniently laboured in respect of their distance, those glebes should be changed and new glebes designed more commodious and nearer to the manse, as good in quality as the former, and not further than a quarter of a mile from the manse. But the power is given not to Presbyteries to effectuate these changes, but to the Parliamentary Commissioners for the Plantation of Kirks—the predecessors of the present Court of Teinds. Further, the Act fell under the rescissory Act, and it is exceedingly doubtful, to say the least of it, whether it was revived by the Act of 1663—(Nairn v. Tweedie,[1] and following cases).

Stair, who treats of the subject of glebes, ii. 3, 40, makes no mention of any such power; there is not a single case on the subject mentioned in Brown's Synopsis, and Erskine, as of date 1773,[2] mentions exchange only in connection with the case of the transportation of a church.

Notwithstanding, however, that there does not seem any statutory sanction for excambion, it is certain that from early times there grew up a practice of excambion. It is worthy of notice that the excambion in this case seems to be of earlier date than any case reported in the books. The first case I have been able to discover is the case of Robertson in 1791, not reported but mentioned in the notes of the older editions of Erskine, and commented on in Mr Duncan's book. The transaction in that case was dated 1752. The position of excambion has accordingly since that date been often recognised by the Court, and I entertain no doubt that it is a completely legal operation.

It is, however, a different question what is its precise legal effect. I am of opinion that Mr Duncan takes a just view of it (530, 2d ed.), "The transaction itself resolves into or presupposes an extrajudicial contract, and necessarily implies voluntary consent to the proposed arrangement on the part of the heritor whose ground is to be acquired as glebe as well as of the Presbytery."

I do not see how any other view can be fairly taken, and the matter may be tested by seeing to what lengths the opposite contention would lead. If this had been an original designation two things are certain, first, that the designation could not have been of greater extent than 4 acres; and, second, that foreshore could never have been designed as arable land; but here the arable lands are over 11 acres in extent, and included (upon the construction of the boundary which I for the moment assume) the foreshore. It is a startling proposition that this can be done by a third designation which could not be done by a first. But on the other theory all this is simple enough. In proper excambion the title flows from the excamber, and he can give whatever extent he thinks it worth his while to give in exchange for the glebe lands. A good illustration of such a subject will be found in the case of Stewart v. Glenlyon,[1] where the Dukes of Atholl had given a very large glebe in exchange for the old glebe which lay close to the Castle of Blair, and which they were therefore probably very glad to obtain as their own property.

No. 110.

Cadell v. Allan.

The true view accordingly seems to be that the title to the land in a case of excambion flows from the excamber. The finding of the Presbytery does not give the land, it gives over the old glebe to the excamber, and it also impresses the new land with the character and status of glebe. Some important results flow from this, it pays no tithe, it need not be held by formal title; and it is emancipated from the claims of any superior, and holds blench from the Crown. Further than that, I do not think the finding of the Presbytery can go, and consequently it must, in my view, be quite ineffectual to transfer land, which is not the property of the excamber, behind the back of a person who is not a party to the deed of excambion. In other words, the difference between the position at an original designation and at a proceeding of excambion is this: At an original designation each heritor knows, or ought to know, that his land may be taken. And, if he allows his land to be designed, taken, and possessed for the years of prescription, he cannot be heard to say that it ought not to have been taken—Dalhousie's Trustees v. Minister of Lochlee.[2] At an excambion transaction, on the other hand, the heritor who is no party to the excambion deed is entitled to suppose that nothing will be transferred except what belongs to the excamber; and, if a question afterwards arises as to what has passed under the deed, he is entitled to treat it as he would any other competition of title.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the excambion of this glebe, sanctioned by the Presbytery in 1817, has not the effect contended for by the respondents and allowed by the Lord Ordinary. This, however, far from ends the matter. The excambion remains quite good as a conveyance, and we must construe the finding of the Presbytery just as we should construe a formal title. It is true that, in so far as it proceeded from Sir George Hope, it was at the time a conveyance a non domino. As there has been ample possession for the prescriptive period that would not in any event matter, so far as the landward portion is concerned, but at anyrate it was saved by a disposition from the Duke of Hamilton, who was by this time the real proprietor of the lands, and which accresced to the conveyance of the excamber. The first point therefore that arises is, did the lands conveyed include the foreshore? The matter cannot be said to be quite clear. It depends on the correct interpretation of the finding of the Presbytery, which I have already read to your Lordships, as the description in a title. On the whole, however, I think the respondent is right when he says that this does give the glebe a sea boundary, and it is now, I think, conclusively settled that a sea boundary is equivalent to an express conveyance of the foreshore. But, further, if there was doubt on the matter, it is permissible to look to possession to clear it up. Now, I do not propose to go through the evidence which has been led. I shall only say that the evidence is in my view ample to shew that the minister here did possess the foreshore in such a way as to shew it belonged to him, and that the acts of possession are quite as strong as those that are said to be necessary by Lord Watson in the leading case of Young v. The North British Railway Company.[1] Now, if there were a competition for the foreshore itself this would end the matter. But the complainer points out that there is not a competition for the foreshore, but for the minerals under it; which minerals, he says, were long ago erected into a separatum tenementum from the foreshore, and to which he holds an express title. That being the state of the title, he says that the glebe title does not include a special title to these minerals, and that possession of the surface can never be effectual to prescribe a right in competition with an express title to the separate tenement of the minerals. Assuming the complainer's title to be as he says (and for the purpose of this argument I am bound to make this assumption), I think the complainer is right. I think that this is the result of the second case of Forbes v. Livingstone,[2] which I consider a binding authority. The whole law on the subject will be found in the two cases of Forbes v. Livingstone,[3] and the cases of Lady Mary Crawfurd v. Bethune[3] and Lady Mary Crawfurd v. Durham.[4] I do not say that these cases are without difficulty—at least in the case of Crawfurd v. Bethune.[3] But if Crawfurd v. Bethune[3] does not square with Forbes v. Livingstone,[2] the latter must prevail. It was a very carefully considered case—reconsidered by the whole Court on a remit from the House of Lords, and it was the unanimous judgment of a Court of Judges who knew more of such matters of conveyancing than it is possible for us to aspire to. The gist of the judgment may be found in one sentence which I take from the joint opinion of Lord President Hope and Lords Gillies, Mackenzie, Eldin, and Medwyn:—"Here we must not regard the possession of the surface of the land; for when coal is claimed in virtue of an infeftment not specially conveying the coal, but the lands generally without any reservation of the coal, in competition with an express reservation of coal in prior, and in themselves preferable, infeftments in favour of another party, the possession founded on for prescription must be that of the coal itself." This authority, so far as I know, has never been controverted or shaken; and with its authority I think the proprietor of the minerals could have been entitled to look on unconcernedly at any possession of the surface by others. The minerals themselves were never interfered with till the proceedings which at once gave rise to the present action.

This brings the state of the matter to this, that the complainer is entitled to prevail if he can shew that he is the proprietor of the separate tenement of minerals upon a title flowing from the Crown; but that the respondents, as in right of a title which, embracing the surface and with possession of the surface, would be good against anyone not holding that special title, are entitled to criticise the complainer's progress of title at any period they please.

Cadell v. Allan.

I therefore find myself obliged to apply myself to that minute consideration of the complainer's title from which the Lord Ordinary in his view of the case held himself excused.

The complainer begins with an express grant of the coal ex adverso of the lands of Grange, Murehouse, Little Carriden, and Stacks contained in a Crown charter which he alleges existed in 1615. He has not got the charter, but he has got the signature signed by the King at Newmarket, the precept under the signet, and an extract from the Treasury books shewing payment of the composition. The charter is to be in favour of John Hamilton, eldest son of Sir John Hamilton of Grange. It is not I think matter of dispute that ex adverso of Little Carriden and Murehouse covers the point in dispute. The charter was primarily a charter of the lands of Grange. I do not profess to discuss the steps, but I think all your Lordships are satisfied that the progress from this title, if it existed, is correctly made out to the complainer.

It is, however, quite enough for the respondents if they can at any stage put a blot in the progress so far as it affects the special conveyance of the coal. I think they have done so in a charter of confirmation and novodamus in 1673, for the proper understanding of which it is necessary to make some further explanation.

In 1613, two years before the alleged Crown charter of 1615 was granted, Sir John Hamilton of Grange feued out to Sir George Bruce of Carnock 24 acres of arable land of his lands of Murehouse and Little Carniden lying along the seashore, and described as bounded by the sea on the north. It is out of these 24 acres that the present glebe is taken, and there is no dispute as to that between the parties. Now, that was a sea boundary, and therefore carried the foreshore, and would have carried the minerals under it (if they belonged to the granter or came to belong to the granter by a subsequent title), were it not for a certain clause which your Lordships will find printed at p. 58 B-C, and which is in these terms:—"And notwtstanding of the setting in fewferme of the saids tuentie four aikeris of land in maner abonementioned wt. liberteis of making of herbereis & poirtis in maner foirsaid, it is speciallie provydit heirby that it salbe lesum to the said Sr. Jon. his airis & assignayis to win coillis & coilhewis stane querrellis & to mak schell lyme vpoun the boundis of the said twentie four aikeris of land in all tyme cuing. except in theis pairtis & placeis of the samy. qr. the saids salt pannis girnell house herbereis bulwarkis & vyis. warkis abonespeit. salhappin to be biggit & planttit the said Jon. his foirsaids alwayis refoundand & payand to the said Sr. George his airis and assignayis all damnage intest. and skaith that he or they salhappin to incur be casting of mynis wying of coillis coilhewis and wyning of stanes vpone the aikeris foresaids."

The respondents argue that this is not a good reservation of the coals for want of proper specification. I do not take that view. I think, looking to the law as laid down in Dunlop v. Duke of Hamilton,[1] that there is here a proper reservation of the coals in the subjects conveyed. These 24 acres passed into the hands of Sir Walter Seaton, and in 1673, on p. 74 of the print, we have a charter of confirmation and novodamus in favour of Seaton granted by the then Hamilton of Grange. Nothing need be said of the charter so far as it is a charter of confirmation, but I ask your Lordships' special attention to it, in so far as it is a charter of novodamus. The novodamus begins on p. 76 (B), and contains the recital of an onerous consideration, as follows:—"Moreover, I, for certain sums of money paid and delivered to me by the said Sir Walter Seatoune, and for divers other good causes and considerations moving me," and then proceeds to of new grant the lands, without inserting any reservation as to the coals, and it ends with a precept of sasine; and on this charter infeftment was duly taken, as is shewn by the instrument of sasine recorded on 2d October 1673, and printed on p. 80.

No. 110. Mar. 17, 1905. Cadell v. Allan.

Now, the granter of this charter was ex hypothesi the owner of the reserved coal; and I am of opinion that when he granted a charter of novodamus of the lands without reservation of the coal, the coal necessarily passed under the general description of the lands. This all depends upon the true import of a charter of novodamus. No doubt a very ordinary use of the addition of a novodamus to a confirmation may be to replace a lost title or to cure a defective title. But it is also well settled that it is, in the words of Mr Bell (Conveyancing, 739), "the appropriate medium by which to express and complete a change in the prior contract between the superior and vassal in any respect."

In this respect it operates and must be construed as an original grant. Stair, ii. 3, 15, says as follows:—"In the charter by the King or subjects there may and useth to be inserted a clause de novo damus, which doth dispone the fee, as by an original right, in case the disponer's right should be found defective, . . . and therefore a novodamus in a bishop's charter from the King, disponing a patronage pro omni jure, was found to give the bishop's successor right to that patronage, though it was a laic patronage, without necessity to instruct that the bishop had any pretence of a title thereto before, but that the novodamus was as effectual as an original right." And Erskine, ii. 3, 23, is to the same effect:—"For a charter of novodamus is, in the judgment of law, an original right; and an original grant implies a release to the vassal from all burdens affecting the property previously to the date of it. One might imagine from the words of this clause that it ought to contain a grant of no subject which had not been made over to the vassal in a former charter, for the expression de novo damus seems to import that the right of that very subject had been formerly made over to the vassal, and that the superior then granted it to him of new; and indeed they are for the most part no more than renewed rights, yet it has been adjudged by repeated decisions that a charter of novodamus may be itself a first grant as well as the renovation of a former; and that every subject or right expressed in the clause of novodamus is deemed to be effectually conveyed to the vassal though there had been no antecedent title to it in his person."

There is a dictum by Lord Rutherfurd Clark in the Duke of Argyle v. Campbell,[1] which, if not sufficiently considered, might seem to be adverse to the view I have been expressing. His Lordship says that a charter of novodamus wherever doubt exists will be construed as commensurate with the previous titles. I think, however, that the doubt to which his Lordship here refers must be a doubt which is raised by the words of the charter itself, and I think this is clear by considering the cases which are cited in the Duke of Argyle's case,[1] and to which his Lordship was probably referring. They were the cases of the Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross,[2] and Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.[3] In the first of those cases the question was whether taxation of the entry of an assignee had been altered by a charter of novodamus, but the judgment of the Lord President is very distinctly put at the bottom of p. 52, and shews that he rested his construction of the novodamus upon the ground that the cause of granting the novodamus had been clearly expressed in the deed, and had to do with something quite other than the alteration of the holding. In the same way in the Earl of Perth's case[3] the question was not as to what was conveyed, but was a question whether the entail under a novodamus must be considered as contained in the procuratory flowing from a subject originally made, and accordingly, to be valid and effectual, it had to be registered in the Register of Tailzies; and whether the charter of novodamus flowing from the Crown could be held as constituting the entail. I think these cases go no further than this, that it is perfectly legitimate to look at other parts of the charter of novodamus to explain any ambiguity in the subjects conveyed. But here there is no ambiguity of the subjects conveyed, because the lands are conveyed and include the minerals, and accordingly I do not think that because the infeftment confirmed by the charter of confirmation contained the reservation, there is any right to construe the charter of novodamus, which is expressed in general terms, by importing a reservation which is not in it. It is, as I have said, legitimate to look at any other portion of the charter of novodamus, and accordingly the complainer here points to the expression used between A and B upon page 77, which is in the following terms:—"Upon the express provisions introduced in favour of the late Sir John Hamilton of Grange, Knight, and his heirs and successors, especially mentioned in the contract and disposition of the said acres of lands by the said late Sir John Hamilton to the late Sir George Bruce of Carnock, Knight."

I am satisfied that upon a just construction the provisions here meant are referable to the provision to make open waters and so on, and are not words of general application which would import reservation. Two other considerations go very strongly for holding the novodamus to be a full grant. The first I have already mentioned, viz., that there is a recital of a money payment for the charter, an altogether inappropriate proceeding unless something new was granted which had not been granted before. But further, there is the fact that the charter winds up with a precept of seisin. I need not remind your Lordships that this precept of seisin was entirely inappropriate to the charter in so far as it was a charter of confirmation. The existing deeds being thereby confirmed, the vassal was without anything more in a full position to grant either procuratory or precept. But with the novodamus, in so far as it operated a new grant, it was otherwise, and a precept of seisin was absolutely necessary if the grantee was ever to be infeft in the subjects for the first time granted. And accordingly I find without surprise that the title was after that completed by taking seisin upon the precept therein expressed. If nothing new had been granted, I look upon this proceeding as an entirely unnecessary performance. It is true there is a phrase in the precept of seisin "reserving as is above reserved." But besides the general well-known doctrine that the dispositive clause is the measure, and is not to be cut down by phrases in executory clauses, I should refer this to the only reservation in terms, i.e., the reservation of the King's Highway. It is strictly inappropriate altogether, as there is no reservation of any sort in the novodamus grant, and, as I have explained, the precept of sasine is only referable to that grant. My opinion therefore on the whole matter is that Hamilton of Grange, being proprietor of the coal and superior of the lands when he gave a charter, not only of confirmation of the lands but also of novodamus, and granted of new the lands without reservation of the coal, cannot now be heard to say that the coal is not part of the grant. This of course disposes of the case, for it kills the title of the complainer. As a matter of fact I think the respondents have shewn that the title thus given under this charter of novodamus did pass to the Duke of Hamilton, and by accretion became good to Sir George Hope, who was the excamber of the glebe of 1817. But, as I have already pointed out, I do not think this matters, because the minister has a perfectly good title upon possession if he is not confronted by somebody having a separate title to the minerals.

This disposes of the case, but there are one or two other matters on which I think it right to give an opinion, as it is possible this case may go elsewhere and the view I have expressed might not be considered sound. I do so all the more readily as on these other points I am in favour of the complainer. It was said by the respondent that the complainer has not produced the original charter of 1615; and that he cannot assume that he would be able to substantiate that charter in the only formal way, viz., by an action of proving the tenor, in which action he would have to call the Crown and the Duke of Hamilton, both of whom would perhaps have a good deal to say in the matter. If that were so, I think this is a formidable objection. But I do not think it matters, for this simple reason. Leaving out of view the charter of 1615, the respondent is able to connect himself with a Crown charter of 1643. Now, the only difference between the date of 1615 and 1643 as regards the complainer's title is that there has been produced a Crown charter in favour of the third Marquess of Hamilton of date 1629, which also has a special title to the coals ex adverso of the whole barony of Carriden, of which it seems there is little doubt that the lands of Grange, Murehouse, and Little Carriden originally formed a part. But I think this is immaterial, because the respondents are totally unable in any way to connect themselves with that title. Now, although if the title of 1643 flowed from a subject it might be sufficient to shew an antecedent grant by which that subject had parted with it to somebody else, this is not the case with the Crown. There is always enough left in the Crown to give a good title, and accordingly in 1643 the Crown charter is a perfectly good title, unless something else better—that is to say prior—can be shewn flowing from the Crown by the person objecting. Accordingly, the complainer cannot have the Hamilton title pled against him, except by somebody who can connect himself therewith. The other matter depends upon the effect of a disposition of 1736 by Hamilton of Grange in favour of Robert Mirrie, but without going at any great length into that deed I am of opinion that upon the principles laid down in Fleeming v. Howden,[1] and Orr v. Mitchell,[2] the said disposition is a conveyance of the superiority and nothing more.

On the whole matter, while, as I have explained, not agreeing with the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, I have come to be of opinion that the result arrived at is right, and I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely concur in your Lordship's opinion, which I have had the advantage of reading. Anything that I can say will, I fear, be mere repetition of what has already been said, but since the question is important and presents some points of difficulty, I think it may be right that I should express, in my own words, the view I take of what I conceive to be the main points for consideration, without attempting to repeat anything like an examination in detail, either of the titles or the principles of law that are applicable to the case.

In the first place, I agree with your Lordship's view as to the first point which seems to me to arise, that the respondent is in exactly the same position in a competition between him and the complainer as if he had obtained a conveyance from Hope of Carriden in 1817, and possessed upon that conveyance to the same extent as he has possessed upon the designation of the glebe. He derives no advantage from the so-called designation except in so far as it gives him a title of possession without direct conveyance and without infeftment. Mr Campbell argued that the designation, being the act of a competent Court, was final and conclusive as to the right of the benefice to everything which the minute of Presbytery purported to design, irrespective of any defect or limitation which might be shewn to attach to the right and title of the landowner from whom the lands of the glebe were derived. The argument was that a designation following upon a voluntary contract of excambion has exactly the same effect, as concluding the whole question of right between the benefice on the one hand and a landowner on the other, as if it had been a designation in the proper sense, in the exercise of the statutory powers which were conferred upon the bishops, and which have been held to be transferred to the Presbytery. But I know of no authority to support that proposition, and I think it is inconsistent with legal principle. I take the result of the examination which your Lordship has made of the statutes and decisions to be clearly this, that when a full and sufficient glebe has once been designed by a Presbytery, there remains no right whatever in the Presbytery to design anew to the effect of taking land from anybody but a willing granter, so as to substitute the new for the old. I do not think it necessary to consider the rescinded Act of 1649, because it is not alleged that the Presbytery proceeded under that statute, or that its conditions were satisfied. But the general rule, as I have stated it, was applied in Linning v. Baillie,[1] and Nairn v. Tweedie,[2] and I do not find in any of the decisions to which your Lordship has referred, and which I have examined, any indication of any law to the contrary. But the statutory powers of the Presbytery were exhausted in 1629 and 1630, and after that they had no more power to take land from a heritor for the purpose of turning it into a glebe than the minister himself would have had. It is quite true that a practice has grown up by which glebes have been excambed for other land in the same parish, with the sanction of the Presbytery, and the excambed land has been thereafter designed by the Presbytery as glebe in place of that given up by the other excamber. But that kind of transaction rests upon voluntary contract and nothing else. The Presbytery had no kind of power or authority to add anything to the right of the landowner from whom they had excambed. They have no statutory power in the matter at all, and the sole source of the right of the benefice to the new land must be found in the right of the granter of the new land, which he gives in exchange for what the Presbytery and the incumbent of the benefice chose to give. The right of the grantee must of necessity be limited by the right of the granter unless it can be shewn that there is some overruling power or authority given by Parliament which will enable the Presbytery to convey from an unwilling heritor land he does not choose to give, or to carry land from an ignorant heritor by a conveyance to which he is no party. That appears to me to be the view taken in all the cases, down to the most recent case of Bain v. Seafield,[3] of the meaning and real effect of a voluntary contract of excambion between the incumbent of a benefice with the sanction of the Presbytery and the private landowner. The case of Stewart v. Lord Glenlyon[4] is a good example, because the benefice was found to have right to a large tract of land which the Presbytery could not lawfully have designed as glebe land, just because the landowner had given it in excambion for the glebe. The intervention of the Presbytery seems to me to serve two purposes, and two only. In the first place, it fills up what the authority of the incumbent himself falls short of, in disponing the glebe land. An incumbent of a parish has no power to alienate that or any other Church property, but the Presbytery, as the guardian of the benefice, may sanction a transaction of that kind which they, in their discretion, are satisfied is for the benefit of the benefice; and therefore their intervention, in the first place, supplies the authority which the incumbent of the benefice does not in himself possess; and in the second place, I think it is settled, by a series of decisions, that the consequent designation by the Presbytery of the new land of the glebe in the place of the old is, like the original designation, equivalent for the purpose of title, to infeftment. It impresses, as your Lordship said, on the new land, the character of glebe land, and therefore the benefice has acquired, by the transaction, a good title of possession upon which a right may be prescribed; but the prescriptive possession which follows must be exactly the same as the prescriptive possession which would follow upon a direct conveyance from a private landowner to a purchaser. This disposes of Mr Campbell's argument on the negative prescription and the case of Paul v. Reid,[1] because the designation is no judicial determination which must be set aside by reduction, but a mere link in the progress of titles which must stand or fall by its own merits in a question with the competing progress. The action, therefore, really resolves into a competition of titles, except in so far as the respondent may be able to say that he has had prescriptive possession upon the title constituted by the contract of excambion, and consequent designation which will fortify his right so as to exclude the competition of any earlier title. That raises the next most important question in the case, as to what kind and extent of possession upon the excambion is necessary to establish a valid title to the minerals in dispute. Now, I think that for the purpose of determining that question, it is necessary in this case to look, in the first place, at the competing titles, because the question of the extent of possession really depends upon whether the complainer has been successful in shewing that at the time when the possession of the incumbent of the benefice began, the estate of minerals under the foreshore was a separate tenement, separate, I mean from the surface of the land, or not. If the minerals were separate from the land at the time the ministers' possession of the land began, then I think with your Lordship that the case of Forbes v. Livingstone[2] is conclusive against any case that the respondent might make of the acquisition by prescriptive possession of a right to the minerals, by the mere possession of the surface of the foreshore. If, on the other hand, the minerals and the surface were not separate estates, but if the surface were conveyed with the minerals under it in the ordinary form, so that the whole subject passed by one conveyance under a sufficient title, then the distinction taken in Lady Mary Crawfurd v. Bethune[3] would apply, and the possession of the land must then be treated as possession of the whole undivided estate, including the minerals below it. I think that view is entirely consistent with the opinion of the Lord President and Lord Gillies in the case of Forbes v. Livingstone,[2] because the whole point of their reasoning depends upon this—that you cannot prove your right to one estate by possessing another. They start from the proposition that the estates are separate, and they say that in order to acquire your title to each you must prove separately your possession of each. That seems to be entirely consistent with the general principle of law. But the moment you get rid of any difficulty created by the separation, the question assumes a different aspect altogether, and is whether you do not possess the whole estate by possessing part of it, even although you have not exercised every right and power which your right of ownership in that entire estate would have given you. In that view, when you have a conveyance of land from which the minerals have not been separated, then the working of the minerals is res merae facultatis which the landowner can exercise or not as he pleases, but his failure to exercise it can throw no doubt upon his right under his title to the land. Therefore, it seems to me, as your Lordship has explained, that at this part of the case, the true question is whether the minerals under the piece of foreshore in question were or were not a separate estate. Now, I think that the one and conclusive answer to that question is afforded by the charter of novodamus. My own view, which so far coincides with that of your Lordship, is that the complainer has succeeded in shewing that he had a good title to the minerals in question as a separate estate under the charter of 1643. I should by no means be disposed to attach much weight to the signature for a charter in 1615, because the signature, so far as we know, was not followed by the granting of a charter, or, at all events, it is not shewn that any charter was granted, and I am not disposed to hold that we can infer, as matter of fact, that because a signature had been obtained a charter in terms of the signature had also been granted by the Crown. But then, for the reasons your Lordship has given, I think that of no importance, because there is certainly a perfectly good title beginning in 1643. But then, the question is whether the separation effected by that charter between surface and minerals was put an end to, and the entire estate, including the surface and minerals, conveyed by the charter of novodamus of 1673, and I think that it was. I do not think it necessary to detain your Lordships by going over again the terms of the charter. I entirely agree with the construction your Lordship has put upon it, and I only say that I cannot entertain any doubt as to the legal effect of a charter of novodamus, if it be clear upon the construction of the language used in it that it conveys something which had not been conveyed by an original grant. I take it to be quite settled law that if a superior who has once granted out lands desires to add anything to the right he had originally created, or to make any alteration in favour of his vassal, or for that matter in favour of himself upon the grant as originally constituted, the right way to do it is to grant a charter of novodamus; and it is a matter of ordinary style and perfectly familiar in conveyancing that the confirmation of previous infeftments is combined with a novodamus when the superior intends to make any such new grant as I have supposed.

I should have had very great hesitation in saying so much, or at all events in saying it with any confidence, if I thought that it was inconsistent with the dictum of Lord Rutherfurd Clark, because the authority of that learned Judge, upon any question of conveyancing, has so much weight, and certainly so much weight with me, that if I thought that he really intended to convey something inconsistent with my own opinion, I should be much more disposed to believe that my opinion was wrong than that his dictum was erroneous. But then, I do not think that the observation which fell from him will bear the construction which the complainer's counsel have endeavoured to put upon it. The rule of construction to which he refers he mentions merely for the purpose of dismissing it as of no consequence to his argument, and therefore it is not impossible that it may have been expressed with something less than his usual precision in laying down a doctrine of law upon which he means to proceed; but apart altogether from that consideration, I think the true meaning of it is exactly what your Lordship has explained. Lord Rutherfurd Clark says that when a doubt arises as to the true meaning of a charter of novodamus, then you must construe the charter with reference to the previous grants, and that may be perfectly consistent with sound principles of construction, for the reason which is explained by Lord Stair in the passage which your Lordship also read. But then, the question is what is the meaning of a doubt arising, and I agree that must mean a doubt arising upon the face of the charter of novodamus itself. Now, a material point to my mind to exclude any doubt of that kind—any doubt which ought to send us back to the previous writs—is that the novodamus starts, in terms, by the announcement of the granter's intention to make a new departure. He begins by confirming his former infeftments, and then he goes on to say that in respect of certain sums of money paid and delivered to him, and for diverse other good causes and considerations moving him, he makes a new grant. That seems to me to bring in as clearly as possible the one consideration for granting a novodamus, which makes it clear that the granter intended something more than the mere renewal of former rights, because he has stated the payment of money as his reason for giving something which professedly he had not given before. On that point therefore, as on the others, I agree with your Lordship. Then, I agree also that the legal effect of that consideration is that we now have lands and minerals well united in one estate, and that the complainer's point upon the separation of the two has completely gone. If the respondent's title can be connected with the charter of novodamus, through the grant of Hope of Carriden, fortified by that of the Duke of Hamilton, he has a perfectly good and effectual title to the foreshore. I think with your Lordship that the connection is made out. But if it is not, the designation is still a good title to found a prescriptive right; and since the land and the minerals are shewn by the novodamus to have been reunited into one estate before the designation or the excambion upon which it proceeded, it follows that if the minister and his predecessors have possessed the land of the foreshore in virtue of their title for forty years, they have possessed land which includes minerals, and have acquired a good prescriptive right to the whole estate; and I think that is the true legal effect of the whole series of titles and of the evidence of possession.

Cadell v. Allan.

May 12, 1905. Ellis v. National Free Labour Association.

plained of—Process.—It is not necessary as a condition of an issue being allowed in an action for written slander that the writing complained of should be produced by the pursuer.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo.—In an action for slander the pursuer complained of the circulation of a pamphlet by the defenders (a free labour association), in which it was stated that the pursuer had been dismissed by the defenders for, inter alia, "withholding moneys belonging to the" defenders "contrary to the byelaws" of the association. The pursuer proposed an issue in which he innuendoed this expression as representing "that pursuer had been guilty of dishonestly appropriating money."

Held that the expression complained of could not reasonably bear the innuendo proposed, and issue disallowed.

1st Division. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

WILLIAM ELLIS, at present General Secretary of the Provincial Free Labour Association, at 163 Great Hamilton Street, Glasgow, brought an action of damages for slander against the National Free Labour Association, carrying on business at 4 Garscube Lane, Cowcaddens, Glasgow, and John Chandler and others, the only known directors and managers and members of the association, and as representing it.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that prior to March 1904 he had been District Secretary of the Glasgow branch of the defenders' association, and that he resigned on 8th March 1904; (Cond. 4) that on 15th March 1904 the defenders through their General Secretary and manager, W. Collison, wrote and sent to C. Houldsworth, a servant of the defenders, who then resided in Glasgow, a letter in these terms,—"I find I cannot finish my business here to-day . . . Keep your eye on the office and Ellis all day and report to me all that takes place. I shall see a good firm of solicitors on my arrival, and apply for a warrant for the arrest of Ellis for withholding the money Thursday morning." "The said letter was written by their secretary on the instructions of the defenders in the course of their business, and in the supposed furtherance of their interests. The statements in said letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and were maliciously made by the defenders to gratify their feelings of ill-will towards the pursuer. Said statements represent, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of such criminal conduct as warranted his arrest and imprisonment, and that he had dishonestly appropriated money belonging to the association"; (Cond. 5) that on 12th April 1904 the defenders circulated throughout Glasgow a pamphlet containing, inter alia, the following statements:—"At a meeting of the Executive Council of the National Free Labour Association held at the Chief Office on Friday, March 11th, 1904, Mr W. Ellis, District Secretary of the Glasgow Branch, was summarily dismissed. The reasons for so doing are best summarised in the terms of the resolution proposing his instant dismissal, which was unanimously carried and promptly acted upon. The resolution was as follows:—'That Mr Ellis be summarily dismissed from the employment of the association for general and continuous disobedience of orders, erratic and insolent behaviour, withholding moneys belonging to the association contrary to the bye-laws, together with a contemptuous disregard of the instructions of the Executive Council through their representative the General Secretary'." "The statements in said pamphlet are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and were maliciously made by the defenders in the knowledge that they were false. Said statements mean and imply, and were intended by the defenders to mean and imply, that pursuer was unfit for the post he held, was flagrantly disobedient as a servant, and was moreover utterly untrustworthy and guilty of dishonest appropriation of money belonging to the defenders."

The defenders lodged defences in which they stated, with regard to the letter referred to in cond. 4, that it was not in their possession, and that it was a private letter written by Collison to Houldsworth, of which the defenders had no knowledge. They called on the pursuer to produce it.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support his pleas.

By interlocutor, dated 8th March 1905, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) approved of the following issues, and appointed the same to be the issues for the trial of the cause:—

(1) and (2) (Two issues which were ultimately not objected to, and which referred to another alleged slander to which it is not necessary to refer in this report).

"(3) Whether, on or about 15th March 1904, the defenders' general secretary and manager, with the authority of the defenders, express or implied, wrote and despatched to Mr C. Houldsworth, now residing at 17 Burr Street, Lower East Smithfield, London, the letter printed No. 2 in the appendix hereto [being the letter referred to in cond. 4, and quoted supra]? Whether the statements in said letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious and were made maliciously, and represent that pursuer had been guilty of such criminal conduct as to warrant his apprehension, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (4) It being admitted that on 12th April 1904 the defenders caused to be sent to subscribers and members of defenders' association the pamphlet printed No. 3 in the appendix hereto [being the pamphlet referred to in cond. 5, and so far as material quoted supra], which pamphlet was duly received by them—Whether the statements in said pamphlet are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and were made maliciously, and represent that pursuer had been guilty of dishonestly appropriating money, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" No. 5 related to the sending of the same pamphlet to certain other persons named.

The defenders reclaimed, and also gave notice of a motion to vary the third issue by deleting the words "with the authority of the defenders, express or implied," and to substitute therefor the words "on the instructions of the defenders."

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers;—(1) The third issue should be disallowed. The letter founded on was not produced, and no attempt had been made to recover it by diligence. No explanation was offered of its not being produced. No issue should be allowed till the letter was produced.[1] This was the rule of practice. If the issue were not disallowed it should be varied as proposed by the defenders. The pursuer averred, and it was his case, that the letter was written on the defenders' instructions. (2) The words founded on in the fourth issue could not reasonably bear the innuendo proposed. All that was said was that the pursuer withheld moneys contrary to the bye-laws.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—(1) It was not necessary as a condition of an issue being allowed that the letter containing the expressions complained of should be produced, or that the pursuer should have taken steps to recover it. All that was necessary at this stage was that the purport of the letter should be set forth.[1] The issue should be allowed as approved by the Lord Ordinary. It was not necessary that the letter should have been written "on the instructions of the defenders." If these words had been omitted the averment would have been quite relevant. A corporation or association was liable for a slander uttered by their servant in the course of his employment, although without special instructions.[2] (2) The words founded on in the fourth issue could reasonably bear the innuendo proposed, and the issue should be allowed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the defenders make no objection to the first and second issues which have been allowed by the Lord Ordinary. As to the third issue, there is not only the objection on the reclaiming note to the allowance of this issue, but there is also the question raised by the motion to vary it, by the deletion of the words "with the authority of the defenders, express or implied," and the substitution therefor of the words "on the instructions of the defenders." I do not think that either of the forms of words proposed is the appropriate issue for bringing this question before a jury. It is impossible to predicate what may be the result of the inquiry into the relationship between the defenders and the writer of this letter, but so far as relevancy is concerned, in the case in the Privy Council to which we were referred, Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown,[2] it was held quite clearly that a servant acting within the scope of his employment may issue a slander or a libel involving liability on his master, just as he may commit any other act on which an action for reparation against his master could be founded. But the question in such a case is always, was the servant in doing what is complained of acting within the scope of his employment or not; and so I think we should adopt the suggestion that was made by Lord M'Laren, and alter the issue so that it will run: "Whether, on or about 15th March 1904, the defenders, by their general secretary and manager, wrote and despatched" the letter, &c. That will leave it quite open to either side to prove their respective contentions, either that the writing of the letter fell within the scope of the secretary's employment, or that it was merely a private letter, and one for which the employers are in no way responsible.

As to issues four and five, which refer to the pamphlet, I am bound to say that I do not see how, under any fair interpretation, the words of the pamphlet can be held to bear the innuendo that is sought to be put upon them. All that is said is that the pursuer withheld moneys contrary to the bye-law, the bye-law being that all money should be paid into the chief office the same day as received. It is absurd to suggest that this statement contains an accusation of theft against the pursuer, and it seems to me it would be difficult to devise clearer language than this for expressing the breach of a bye-law. I am therefore of opinion that issues four and five should be disallowed.

Ellis v. National Free Labour Association.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I think the proper form for the third issue is as your Lordship has suggested. If the letter complained of was written by the secretary within the scope of his employment, the defenders will be liable for it; but if it was not within the scope of his employment, then they will not be liable.

The only other remark I desire to add is as to the contention that the issue should not be allowed till the letter is produced. I know of no authority for that contention. There is no difference in our law as to the proving of a written or spoken slander. The pursuer must prove, whether by writ or parole, that the words relied on were used. That is a matter of proof. The only question now before us is whether the principal letter must be produced before an issue is allowed.

On the issues four and five I also agree. All that is averred is that the defenders issued a pamphlet in which they stated that the pursuer had been dismissed for, amongst other reasons, "withholding moneys belonging to the Association contrary to the bye-laws." The pursuer says that that meant that he had been guilty of appropriating the moneys. I think it is quite the contrary, and that the words mean that there had been a difference of opinion on the interpretation of the bye-laws. I think the innuendo is not reasonable, and that the issues should therefore be disallowed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship and also with the additional observations of Lord Adam. If there were a different rule as to spoken and written slander—if, as we know is the case in the sister country, no action would lie for spoken slander unless for special damage—there might be some ground for demanding the production of the writing complained of before an issue was allowed. But there is no such distinction in our law. It suffices if the pursuer at the trial proves the writing of which he complains, just as it is sufficient in a case of spoken slander to prove that the defamatory words were uttered.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree as to the objection that the letter referred to in the third issue has not been produced. Assuming that the words complained of are slanderous, I think all that is necessary for relevancy is that the pursuer should aver that the letter containing these words was written and uttered by the defender, and from what the Lord President is reported to have said in the case of Stephen v. Paterson[1] it does not appear that anything more was thought to be necessary in that case. Admitting the relevancy, the letter must in general be produced to prove the slander, but it is not necessary that the writing should be produced as a condition of an issue being allowed.

As to the form of the third issue, I agree with your Lordship. The point is regulated by the rule expounded by Mr Justice Willes in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank,[2] that an employer will be answerable for a wrong committed by his servant in the course of his service and for the master's benefit, although the particular act has not been specially authorised. The words proposed by your Lordship will raise the question at issue.

Ellis v. National Free Labour Association.

As to the fourth and fifth issues, I agree with your Lordships. I will only add that when the pamphlet complained of says that the pursuer "withheld moneys contrary to the bye-laws," it charges a breach of bye-law and not an offence against the criminal law of the country, and therefore it cannot reasonably bear the proposed innuendo.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I omitted to mention the technical point that was raised as to the production of the letter. On that point I agree with your Lordships. I have looked into the Session Papers of Rose v. M'Leod,[1] and it is quite clear that in that case the Court never had the actual terms of the letter before it.

THE COURT varied issue No. 3 so as to make it read, "Whether, on or about 15th March 1904, the defenders, by their general secretary and manager, wrote and despatched," and so forth as in the issue No. 3, quoted supra, and disallowed issues No. 4 and No. 5.

THE REV. J. G. SUTHERLAND AND OTHERS (Trustees and Committee of Management of Gateside School), Petitioners.—Hon. H. Gordon.

Charitable and Educational Trust—School—Scheme for administration of endowment and proceeds of sale of school—Religious Education—Technical Instruction—Evening Classes.—In a deed of trust, the truster, upon the narrative of his "being sensible of the benefit of extending religious education to the children of the working classes," provided for the endowment of a school at G., and directed that the Bible should be read daily in the school. Owing to modern educational requirements it was ultimately found impossible to carry on the school, and it was sold under authority of the Court. The committee of management then presented a scheme for the application of the endowment.

The Court approved of the scheme in so far as it proposed to devote the funds to providing technical instruction in manufactures, agriculture, and dairy work and ambulance work; but refused to sanction their application to promoting instruction in Scripture knowledge in G., and maintaining a Sunday school library and providing prizes for the Sunday school at G., and to establishing evening classes in the Board School there.

1ST DIVISION. (SEE ante, Feb. 3, 1903, vol. v., p. 424.)

By trust-disposition and endowment dated in 1855 the late William Patrick, of Roughwood, on the narrative of his "being sensible of the benefit of extending religious education to the children of the working classes," gave and conveyed to the minister of the parish and his successors in office in trust certain ground at Gateside upon which a schoolhouse and playground, and a schoolmaster's house, offices, and garden were situated, and also granted an annual rent of £25 over part of his lands of Roughwood. The truster directed that the school and playground should be for ever appropriated and used for the education of children and adults of the labouring manufacturing and other poorer classes of Gateside or in the parish of Beith, and for a Sunday school, and as a dwelling-house for the schoolmaster, and for no other purpose. The management of the school and ground-annual was entrusted to a committee, which, after the death of the truster was to consist of the parish minister and three proprietors and their successors in their estates, the parish minister being chairman. With regard to the instruction to be given in the school the truster directed that it should comprise at least English grammar, reading, and spelling; writing, arithmetic, geography, and Scripture history; and that the teacher should occasionally explain the physiological state of the body, and give directions and instructions as to the habits best calculated for the preservation of health. "And it shall be a fundamental regulation and practice of the said school that the Bible be daily read therein by the children, but no child shall be required to learn any catechism or other religious formulary, or attend any Sunday school or place of worship to which respectively his or her parent or guardian shall, on religious grounds, object, and the selection of the Sunday school and place of worship shall, in all cases, be left to the free choice of such parent or guardian without the child's thereby incurring any loss of the benefits and privileges of the foresaid school."

Owing to modern educational requirements it was found impossible to carry on the school, and the present petition was presented to the Court for power to dispose of the school buildings and schoolmaster's house and ground in connection therewith. After the decision of the Court (reported ante, 5 F. 424) refusing authority to convey the subjects gratuitously to the School Board, and allowing the petitioners to lodge a scheme, the managers received authority from the Court on 3d June 1903 to sell the subjects to the School Board, and they were sold and disponed to them accordingly in July 1903.

The petitioners in March 1905 presented a scheme for the administration of the trust funds, being the sum of £550 realised by the sale of the heritable subjects and the ground-annual of £25. The parts of the scheme which are material to this report are quoted in note, infra,* those words which were ultimately deleted by the Court being enclosed in square brackets.

* "II. . . . The balance of said funds, together with the income of any other funds in their hands, shall be applied, after meeting the annual expenses of the trust in [any one or more of the following purposes as may seem in the discretion of the trustees to be most desirable for the time being, viz.:—(1) In promoting instruction in the Bible and in Scripture knowledge to be given in or near the village of Gateside; (2) In establishing and maintaining a Sunday school library in connection with the Sunday school at Gateside; (3) In providing prizes to the children attending the said Sunday school; (4) In] providing such technical instruction in any of the following subjects as the funds will permit, viz.:—1. Technical instruction in manufactures. 2. Instruction in agriculture and dairy work. 3. Instruction in ambulance work and first aid to the injured. And such instruction may be provided either by contributing to the salaries of lecturers or instructors visiting the district, or in providing classes for longer or shorter periods at Gateside or Beith, or by giving bursaries in the said subjects to or by paying the expenses and fees of children resident in Gateside to enable them to attend classes or lectures in said subjects at institutions or colleges elsewhere, or in some such other method as shall seem to them most in accordance with the design of the truster. . . . In support of the proposed purposes (1), (2), and (3), counsel for the petitioners referred to the truster's directions as to religious instruction, and cited Kirk-Session of Prestonpans v. School Board of Prestonpans.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This scheme relates to a somewhat small endowment consisting of an annuity of £25 and the interest of the proceeds of the sale of the school—being £550—the school having been sold, under power granted by this Court, because it had been found impossible to carry it on in view of modern educational requirements. The scheme has been submitted to us so that we may consider whether it is feasible and as far as possible in accordance with the testator's views.

Though it was natural, from a wish to follow the testator's wishes with regard to religious education, that the three subsections dealing with that matter should have been inserted, I do not think we should approve of them. The testator's provision as to religious instruction was part of his scheme of having a school. But the school being gone, and the trustees having no control over the religious education given in Gateside, I think it is better that these subsections should come out.

The eighth section of the scheme is unnecessary, unless it is meant to provide for the institution of ordinary continuation classes. That is the business of the School Board, and I do not think it would be right to devote the funds to that purpose. This section therefore should be deleted.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

An amended scheme giving effect to the deletions directed by the Court having been lodged, the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—". . . Settle the scheme for the administration of the trust funds connected with Gateside School, Ayrshire, as set forth in the amended scheme No. 24 of process; approve thereof," &c.

pleted "under his directorship." The circular did not state (as was the fact) that the work referred to had been done by H. and Co. while M. was one of their managing directors.

Held that the circular was likely to mislead an ordinary reader into the belief that the work specified had been done by M. & Co. and not by H. & Co., and (rev. judgment of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Dundas),) that H. & Co. were entitled to interim interdict against M. & Co. publishing, issuing, or circulating it.

1ST DIVISION. Bill-Chamber.

JOHN HENDERSON & SON, LIMITED, were incorporated as a company in 1896, and carried on business in Glasgow as artesian well engineers and mineral boring prospectors. They had taken over the business of John Henderson & Son, which at that time had the largest artesian well engineering business in Scotland. From the incorporation of the Company down to 1904 Alexander Munro acted as one of the managing directors of the company. He had not had any connection with the management of John Henderson & Son prior to the formation of the Company. In December 1904 his engagement with the Company came to an end, and in January 1905 he began business on his own account as an artesian well engineer and mineral boring prospector in Glasgow under the firm name of Alexander Munro & Company.

Shortly after beginning business Alexander Munro & Company issued an advertising trade circular entitled, "To Consumers of Town's Water and Others on the Economic Value of Artesian Well Water Supply. Alexander Munro & Company, Artesian Well Engineers and Mineral Boring Prospectors, Atlantic Chambers, 45 Hope Street, Glasgow," and containing a statement headed "Artesian Tube Wells," in which, after observations as to the method of obtaining water by artesian wells, the excellence of the water so obtained, and its low cost as compared with other methods, they stated as follows:—

"Our Mr Munro has had extensive experience as managing director for many years with the largest artesian well engineers in Scotland, and is an expert in this class of work.

"The following is a list of some of those for whom artesian tube wells have been put down, a special visit having been made by him in each case to the different localities and positions fixed for the wells, all of which have been successful, the yield being from 5000 to 400,000 gallons of splendid water per day." (Then followed a list of thirty-two names.) "Expressions of satisfaction have been received in many instances upon the results obtained.

"He has also had the following boring work under his personal supervision." (Then followed a list of twenty-one names and pieces of work.)

"The following are some of the contracts completed under his directorship." (Then followed a list of thirty-six names.)

This circular did not state (as was the fact) that the work referred to had been done by John Henderson & Son, Limited, during the time when Alexander Munro was a managing director.

In February 1905 John Henderson & Son, Limited, brought a note of suspension and interdict against Alexander Munro & Company, and Alexander Munro as the only known partner of that firm and as an individual, in which they craved interdict, inter alia, against the respondents publishing, issuing, or circulating the circular above mentioned, and also interim interdict.

No. 113.

May 12, 1905. John Henderson & Son v. Alexander Munro & Co.

The complainers also craved interdict against the respondents making certain representations in any future circulars.

The question raised by the crave for interdict against future circulars and by the whole of the averments and pleas of the complainers was whether the respondent was justified in representing that he was the expert who had charge of the practical and prospecting work in putting down artesian wells and conducting other boring operations while he was managing director of the complainers' Company. Upon this question the parties were at issue.

The respondents lodged answers, and pleaded, inter alia;—(3) All the statements and representations in the circular complained of being in fact true, interdict ought to be refused.

By interlocutor, dated 24th February 1905, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Dundas) passed the note, and refused interim interdict.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—The complainers were entitled to interim interdict against the publication of the circular libelled on record. The injury to the complainers by the publication would be great, whereas the injury to the respondent from delay in publication would be small. The intention of the circular was to mislead the public, but it was sufficient that there was a risk of the public being misled by it. Even if it was capable of a construction which was true, it was enough for the complainers' contention if the language used was calculated to mislead even the casual, heedless, and unwary reader.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—To justify interim interdict it was necessary that there should be (1) a strong prima facie case, and (2) a balance of convenience in favour of granting it. Neither condition was fulfilled here. On a fair interpretation what the circular said was that while managing director of a large business in the line referred to certain work was done, part of it by himself personally. That was true. There was no statement or implication that the work referred to was done by the respondent's firm. What the complainers objected to was the respondent representing that he was the expert who carried out the operations. Upon that question there was no prima facie case. The balance of convenience was against interim interdict. It would be impossible for the respondent if he was ultimately held in the right to shew what he had lost by the interim interdict being granted, whereas it would be easy for the complainers to shew what they had lost by the publication of the circular.

Lord President.—In this case John Henderson & Son, Limited, artesian well engineers and mineral boring prospectors, have brought a note of suspension and interdict against Alexander Munro & Company, who are also artesian well engineers and mineral boring prospectors, and they seek to have interdict against the publishing, issuing, and circulating of a certain circular sent out by the respondents. The complainers ask for interdict of this circular in particular, and then, as is usual, the prayer of the note goes on to ask for interdict against various things which the complainers say the respondents ought not to be allowed to do in future circulars. The case is in the Bill-Chamber, and it is only before your Lordships on the question of interim interdict. No one disputes that this is a proper case for trial, and that the note has been properly passed. But the complainers maintain that they are entitled to interim interdict. I confess that the only real difficulty which I have had has arisen from the pleadings of the complainers. It is perfectly clear that the true case for interim interdict is not properly raised. But technically it is before your Lordships, because it is raised by the crave for interdict of the particular circular which has been published by the respondents.

Now, it is plain that the object of this circular was to attract customers to Munro & Company. It is headed "Artesian Tube Wells." It contains a statement of how to obtain water by artesian wells. It commends the quality of the water so obtained, and alleges that the cost is moderate as compared with a pipe supply. On the second page the circular goes on to say, "Our Mr Munro has had extensive experience as managing director for many years with the largest artesian well engineers in Scotland." That refers to a fact which nobody denies. Munro was admittedly managing director with the complainers. The circular then says that Munro "is an expert in this class of work." That in one sense is a matter of fact, in another it is a matter of opinion. Some "experts" are only experts in their own opinion. No legal objection can be taken to this statement. But then the circular goes on to say:—"The following is a list of some of those for whom artesian tube wells have been put down, a special visit having been made by him, i.e., 'our Mr Munro,' in each case to the different localities and positions fixed for the wells." Then follows a long list of names. It is explained that none of this work was done by Munro & Company, but that it was all done by the complainers during the time Munro was their managing director. It would have been easy to make a statement which would have made this quite clear. As it is, I do not think I am pressing anything unduly when I say that many people would think on reading the circular that Munro & Company had executed this work. If they took that meaning out of it, it would be misleading and untrue, and the natural result would be that they might go to Munro & Company upon seeing their large experience in the past. If they did so, injury would result to the complainers because of the attribution of the experience of Henderson & Son to Munro & Company.

This circular must be taken not on a minute examination of its terms by a trained tribunal, but on its effect upon the general reader. So viewed it is likely to prove misleading, and if so the respondents ought not to be allowed to publish it. I am therefore in favour of granting interim interdict against the publication of this particular circular.

I am not inclined to say anything more. A record has not been made up. We grant interim interdict against the circular as it stands. I say nothing as to any other circular which Munro & Company may see fit to issue pending the decision of the case.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—In questions of interim interdict, where the action is founded on representations, I think the Court would not, unless under very exceptional circumstances, grant interim interdict, except against the particular representation complained of. That would of course prevent the issue of any other representation which was a mere paraphrase or colourable variation of the circular complained of. I therefore agree that if interim interdict is to be granted here, it should be limited to an interdict against the issuing of the particular circular which is complained of.

No. 113.

May 12, 1905. John Henderson & Son v. Alexander Munro & Co.

In that view of the case the question we have to consider is whether this circular amounts to a misleading statement, or, at all events, to such an ambiguous statement that it may mislead the public, and so cause injury to the complainers' business. It may be true that on a critical examination of the phraseology of this document it will be seen that it never really says that these works were executed by the respondents' firm; and, indeed, an astute reader might, from that very circumstance, draw the inference that they were not so executed, for if they had been, the fact would have been more clearly stated in the circular. But then there are members of the public, to which this circular is addressed, who might read it in an uncritical spirit, and would be impressed only by the general effect conveyed, and if so read I think the circular is calculated to lead such a reader to the conclusion that the respondents' firm had executed the specified works. I think, therefore, that the complainers are entitled to an interdict against a circular which may be read as representing that the respondents had executed all these important works which were in reality carried out by the complainers. In issuing such a circular the respondents owed a duty to the complainers to see that it was made clear that Mr Munro only acted as assistant and not as principal. Now, the respondents' circular does not clearly shew that Mr Munro was only acting as an assistant, and I therefore agree that interim interdict should be granted in the terms your Lordship has proposed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for the complainers against the interlocutor of Lord Dundas, dated 24th February 1905, and heard counsel thereon, recall said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note and grant interim interdict against the respondents publishing, issuing, or circulating the circular, No. 6 of process."

cause for not sending a case of this kind to a jury, that the Court ought not readily to interfere with what he had done in the exercise of it, and that there was no ground for doing so in this case.

The Lord Ordinary has the same discretion as regards the mode of proof in an action transmitted under section 6 (3) of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, as in an action originated in the Court of Session.

2D DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

JOSEPH VALLERY, labourer, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Robert M'Alpine & Sons, contractors, Glasgow, in which he craved decree for £160, 11s., or such sum as might be found due by the defenders to the pursuer under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in respect of injuries sustained by him while in their employment.

On 10th January 1905, before the record in the action was closed, the pursuer lodged a note for the transmission of the process to the Court of Session under section 6 (3) of the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

On 21st February the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) closed the record, and appointed a diet for the adjustment of issues.

On 14th March the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the adjustment of issues allows the parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—This was an action of damages for personal injuries, and therefore one of the causes specially enumerated as appropriate for jury trial in section 28 of the Judicature Act,[1] and also one of the causes excepted in section 49 of the Court of Session Act, 1850,[2] and it could only be sent to proof of consent or on special cause shewn.[3] The Court were entitled and bound to consider whether there was special cause, and to reverse the Lord Ordinary if there was not.[4] This was not a case of interfering with the Lord Ordinary's discretion. The question was whether special cause had been shewn in the sense of the statute. The special cause stated by the Lord Ordinary was not sufficient.[5]

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—There was no distinction, as regards the present question, between a case which had been transmitted under section 6 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and a case which had originated in the Court of Session. The Court would not interfere with the discretion exercised by the Lord Ordinary as to the mode of inquiry except upon very special grounds.[6] That rule applied to cases like the present. There was no ground for interfering with what the Lord Ordinary had done here. The special cause assigned by the Lord Ordinary was quite sufficient.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that an action such as the present need not necessarily be sent to trial before a jury. After the action has been removed to the Court of Session under section 6 of the Employers Liability Act, it is for the Lord Ordinary to determine the mode of trial, as in the case of an action originally raised in the Court of Session. In the present instance the Lord Ordinary has exercised his discretion by sending the case to proof, and I should be very slow to interfere with what he has decided in the exercise of his discretion. I do not say that there might not be cases in which the Court would interfere, but it would require to be on very strong grounds. Here no cause has been shewn for altering the decision of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD KYLLACHY and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to take the proof allowed by the interlocutor reclaimed against.

2D DIVISION.

ALEXANDER MILNE, sometime of Assam, India, afterwards residing in Aberdeen, died, domiciled in Scotland, on 8th March 1903, leaving a last will and testament, dated 19th April 1898, by which, after providing for payment of debts and expenses, and of various specific and pecuniary legacies, he provided as follows:—"And should any balance remain over from my estate after satisfying all the above claims, then I devote such balance or residue to the Bursary Fund of the Aberdeen University, to help in the education of poor and struggling youths of merit, and in order to carry out and give effect to my wishes as above set forth, I nominate and appoint as executors of this my last will and testament" two persons named, "or either of them accepting."

[1] Jack v. Rivet, Bolt, and Nut Co., Limited, March 10, 1894, 6 F. 572; M'Nab v. Fyfe, July 5, 1904, 6 F. 925.

The executors accepted office. After satisfying debts and legacies a balance of residue remained in their hands, amounting to £9000.

In the University of Aberdeen the various bursary endowments are not merged in one general bursary fund, but each individual endowment is kept separate, the revenue being devoted to the special purpose for which the bursary was founded. These bursaries differ from one another in regard to their objects, value, conditions of tenure, &c.*

Questions having arisen between the parties interested as to the application of the balance of residue, the present special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties to the special case were (1) the executors, (2) the University Court of the University of Aberdeen, (3) the whole heirs in mobilibus of the testator.

The first parties maintained (1) that as the testator's intention to help poor and struggling youths of merit in their education by means of bursaries was clearly expressed, the bequest was valid; (2) that the second parties were not entitled to receive and discharge it, but that the first parties were bound to "devote" or administer the residue under a scheme to be approved by the Court.

The second parties contended (1) that the words "the Bursary Fund of the Aberdeen University" in the will of the deceased were not intended to refer to some fund with this special title, but simply to indicate the testator's desire that the money should be held along with the other bursary funds of the University for the special purpose specified by him; (2) that they were entitled to receive and discharge the said balance of residue, and that the fund should be handed over to them in order that they might administer the same in such manner as best to give effect to the wishes of the testator.

The third parties contended that the bequest of balance of residue was void in respect it referred to a bursary fund which did not exist; and further, that as the testator gave no specific directions how the money was to be applied in carrying out his wishes, and particularly did not indicate whether the revenue only was to be applied, or the whole capital and revenue expended till exhausted, and conferred no discretionary powers upon any person or persons in reference to the administration of the money, the bequest was invalid from vagueness and want of specification. They therefore claimed that this balance of residue was intestate succession, and fell to the heirs in mobilibus of the truster.

The questions of law were:—"1. Is the bequest of said balance of residue to the bursary fund of the Aberdeen University valid? 2. (1) Are the second parties entitled to receive and discharge the same? or (2) does it fall to be administered by the first parties under a scheme to be approved by the Court? or, 3. Is said bequest invalid through vagueness and uncertainty, and does the balance fall to be paid to the testator's heirs ab intestato?"

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The bequest was valid. The case fell within the rule that a bequest for an object and a class of persons specified was good, although the selection of the individuals to be benefited was left to someone else.[1] The purpose of the bequest was clear. It was that the fund should be held by the University as a bursary fund, and that duly qualified bursars should be selected by the usual methods. There was no such vagueness here as was found fatal in Blair v. Duncan[2] and in Grimond (or Macintyre) v. Grimond.[3] This was a charitable bequest. It was consequently entitled to a liberal and benignant construction, and if the general intention was indicated the Court would find means of carrying the details into operation.[4] (2) The University Court were the proper persons to administer the fund. They had the power and means of doing so. There was no provision in the will for a continuing trust.

Argued for the third parties;—The bequest was void for uncertainty. The class to whom the bequest was made was not sufficiently defined,[5] and no power was given to anyone to select the individuals to be benefited. This was not a charitable bequest.[6] The case of Baird's Trustees,[6] though overruled as a decision on the Income-Tax Act by Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income-Tax v. Pemsell,[7] was still an authority for the purposes of the present question.[8] A bequest of a fund to a University for a bursary would be good, but a bequest for bursaries even if the University was specified was too vague. A bequest for "charities in Aberdeen" had been held void for uncertainty.[9] Neither the University nor the executors were given any power of selection. That was a defect which the Court would not supply.[10] The will did not say whether the capital or only the income was to be used.

Argued for the first parties;—The trustees whom the testator had selected were the proper persons to administer the fund. This was in accordance with the testator's intention as disclosed in his will. There was no bequest to the University. The Court would provide for the future administration of the fund.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When one looks at this clause in this will I think it is quite clear that it was the intention of the testator to dispose of the residue and to devote it to a certain object. That object was the bursary fund of the University of Aberdeen. That is not ambiguous in any way. It does not matter whether there was a bursary fund in existence or whether this was to be the bursary fund. The testator intends that the money is to go to provide bursaries. His purpose was to help in the education of poor and struggling youths of merit in the University. This implies selection. Merit implies selection. But surely there can be no difficulty about that in the University.

I have therefore no hesitation in holding (1) that this is a good bequest for a well-defined purpose—it does not matter whether it is a charitable purpose or not; and (2) that the money should be handed over to the University Court. The only question is as to the scheme under which the fund is to be held. The Court will give its aid in this matter.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree. The University of Aberdeen is a great educational corporation, and has a statutory constitution, according to which it is one of the duties of the University Court to administer such portions of the University funds as are devoted to bursaries. The University has such funds, or, if it has not now, it may have them at any time; and the testator here seems to have assumed that it would possess, for purposes of administration, a "Bursary Fund," to which such funds should belong, and by means of which they could be kept separate from other funds. Accordingly, he makes this bequest, expressing it simply as a bequest "to the Bursary Fund of the University of Aberdeen." I am, I confess, unable to see any particular difficulty either as to the construction of such a bequest or as to its efficacy. It is, as I read it, simply a bequest to the University of Aberdeen, upon trust for the purpose that, either by itself or in conjunction with other funds, it should be applied by the Governing Body of the University, to a quite definite and known object, viz., the providing of bursaries to aid in the education in the University of a certain class of students. I know no ground for impeaching such a bequest as void from uncertainty. Neither do I see any sufficient reason for requiring the executors of the deceased to undertake the administration. The executors will, I think, be safe and be doing their duty in paying over the money to the University Court, whose receipt will, so far as I see, be a quite sufficient discharge. It is another matter whether we should not appoint the University Court to submit a scheme for our approval in the first instance. On that matter I am inclined to agree that that should be done.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. I think this bequest is the same as a bequest to Aberdeen University for the purpose of forming a bursary fund. And I also hold that this bequest is protected from invalidity by being for charitable purposes. I think it should go to the University to be administered under a scheme to be settled by the Court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question . . . in the affirmative, and the second question by declaring that the second parties are entitled to receive and Process—Competency—No title or interest to defend—Company—Winding-up—Preference—Poor-Rates—Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 88.—In a note by the liquidators of a company for authority, inter alia, to take credit for their remuneration, as fixed by the Court, and to pay the law expenses, and to pay the preferable claims as set forth in a schedule, among which was included a claim for poor-rates due by the Company, answers were lodged by a collector of poor-rates, who maintained that the liquidators should be ordained to pay the claim for poor-rates preferably to the liquidators' remuneration and their law expenses. The liquidators stated that their accounts shewed a balance in their hands more than sufficient to pay in full all the preferable claims, after payment of the liquidators' remuneration and law expenses, and that the respondent had been informed of this before he lodged answers. Held that, in respect the liquidators had admitted the claim for poor-rates to a preferential ranking and tendered payment thereof in full, there was no proper question presented to the Court for adjudication on the answers, and note remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Company—Winding-up—Poor-Rates—Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. c. 62), sec. 1, (1) (3).—Opinion, per Lord Low, Ordinary, (1) that the provisions of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, are applicable to Scotland, in so far as they deal with the case of companies which are being wound up under the Companies Acts, and (2) that under section 1, subsections (1) and (3), of that Act, poor-rates due by a company at the commencement of the winding-up thereof do not fall to be paid preferably to the liquidators' fees and the law expenses incurred by him in the liquidation.

1ST DIVISION. ON 19th February 1904 the Court ordered the Scottish Drug Depot, Limited, to be wound up under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and appointed James Alexander Robertson Durham, C.A., and James Craig, C.A., both of Edinburgh, to be joint official liquidators.

On 10th January 1905 the liquidators presented a note, stating that the businesses and other assets of the Company had been realised, and craving the Court to remit to an accountant to audit the liquidators' accounts; to fix the remuneration of the liquidators; to authorise them to take credit for such remuneration and to pay the law expenses incurred by them; to approve of the deliverances of the liquidators as set forth in a schedule produced, and rank the claims of the creditors accordingly; and to authorise the liquidators to pay the preferable claims and to divide the surplus funds thereafter in the hands of the liquidators among the ordinary creditors pro rata of their claims.

The liquidators produced an account of their intromissions, shewing a balance in hand of £925, 18s. 10d. From the schedule produced with the note it appeared that claims, amounting in all to £117, 9s. 4d., had been admitted to a preference—these claims including, inter alia, one for £20, 0s. 6½d., in respect of poor and school assessments due by the Company as occupiers of certain shops in Edinburgh.

Alexander Fraser, collector of poor and school rates for the City Parish of Edinburgh, lodged answers, in which he stated that the company were owing poor and school assessments to the amount of £20, 0s. 6½d., and that he had lodged a claim for that sum. Founding on the provisions of sec. 88 of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845,* he objected to the liquidators' fees and the law expenses of the liquidation being preferred to his claim in the order of payment, and maintained that the Court should direct and ordain the liquidators to pay his claim "out of the first proceeds of the estate, and preferably to all debts of a private nature, and, in particular, preferably to the liquidators' fees and law expenses incurred by them, and to rank" his claim accordingly.

The liquidators lodged replies, in which they referred to the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, sec. 1 (1), (3),† and explained that "the funds in hand are ample to cover the claims admitted to a preferential ranking in full, after payment of the remuneration of the liquidators and their law expenses, and the claimant was made aware of this before he lodged the answers."

On 3d March 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the poor-rates due from the said company at the commencement of the winding up thereof do not fall to be paid preferably to the liquidators' fees and law expenses incurred by them, but fall to be paid in terms of section 1 (3) of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888; and in respect that the liquidators have admitted the claim for said poor-rates to a preferable ranking, and tender payment thereof in full, finds that it is unnecessary to pronounce further upon said answers; therefore dismisses the said answers . . ."‡

* The Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 88, enacts,—" . . . and all assessments for the relief of the poor shall in case of bankruptcy or insolvency be paid out of the first proceeds of the estate, and shall be preferable to all other debts of a private nature due by the parties assessed."

† The Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 62), enacts, section 1 (1):—" . . . in the distribution of the assets of any company being wound up under the Companies Act, 1862, and the Acts amending the same, there shall be paid in priority to all other debts—(a) All parochial or other local rates due from . . . the company at the date of . . . the commencement of the winding-up, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before that time . . . (b) Subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs of administration or otherwise, the foregoing debts shall be discharged forthwith so far as . . . the assets of the company . . . are sufficient to meet them."

‡ "OPINION.—. . . The liquidators have ranked the claim as a preferable debt, and there is no dispute that the funds are sufficient to pay the expenses of the liquidation (including the remuneration of the liquidators) and the preferable debts. The collector, however, is not satisfied with a preferable ranking, but maintains that the rates ought to have been paid out of the first proceeds of the estate, and preferably to all debts of a private nature, including the liquidators' fees and the expenses of the winding-up.

"That view is rested upon the 88th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845,

No. 116.

May 16, 1905.
Liquidators of Scottish Drug Depot, Limited, v. Fraser.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The provisions of the 88th section of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845, that poor-rates, in cases of bankruptcy, should be "paid out of the first proceeds of the estate," and should be "preferable to all other debts of a private nature," were decisive in favour of the reclaimer's contention. That section was unrepealed, and was unaffected by the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888. The latter statute had no application to Scotland whatever. The Lord Ordinary's view that the statute, though not applicable to Scotland quoad sequestrations under the Bankruptcy Acts, was nevertheless applicable to Scotland quoad companies being wound up, was untenable. While, in the present case, there was a sufficient balance to pay the claim for poor-rates as well as the liquidators' fees and law expenses, it was of importance in the public interest and in view of future cases, that it should be which provides that all assessments 'for the relief of the poor shall in case of bankruptcy or insolvency be paid out of the first proceeds of the estate, and shall be preferable to all other debts of a private nature due by the parties assessed.'

"Even if that enactment was the statutory provision now in force in the case of companies in liquidation, it would be necessary to consider how far it supported the claim of the collector that poor-rates fall to be paid before any provision is made for the expenses of the liquidation. But it is unnecessary to consider that question if, as the liquidators contend, the matter is now regulated by the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 62).

"In regard to that Act, I think that there are strong reasons for holding that it is not applicable to Scotland so far as sequestrations under the Bankruptcy Acts are concerned, but I see no sufficient ground for affirming that it does not apply to Scotland in the case of companies which are being wound up under the Companies Acts.

"Prima facie the Act applies to Scotland, because Ireland is excluded from its operation, while Scotland is not excluded, and further, I do not think that there is any difficulty in applying its provisions, so far as companies in liquidation are concerned, to Scotland. It is also worthy of observation that the Act was amended in 1897 by an Act (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 19), which makes provision in certain cases for the payment of the debts declared to be preferable by the Act of 1888 in priority to the claims of holders of debentures under a floating charge created by the company. These provisions are not appropriate in the case of Scotch Companies, and accordingly it is provided that the Act shall not extend to Scotland. The Act, however, is made applicable to Ireland, which was excluded from the Act of 1888, and it is so made applicable by declaring that in its application to Ireland the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1889, shall be substituted for the Act of 1888. That shews that the Legislature had in 1897 considered the position of the Act of 1888 as regards both Scotland and Ireland, and had deliberately allowed the Act to remain, as it bore to be, an Act applicable to Scotland.

"It was argued, however, that if the Act had been intended to apply to Scotland the 88th section of the Poor-Law Act would have been repealed. If the Act of 1888 does not apply to sequestrations that argument is not of much weight, because the terms of the 88th section are more appropriate to cases falling under the bankruptcy laws than to insolvent companies, for the winding up of which a special code was provided by the Companies Act of 1862. If, as I think was the case, the Act of 1888 applied only to companies in Scotland that would account for the 88th section of the Poor-Law Act not being to any extent repealed.

"I am therefore of opinion that the Act of 1888 applies, and it provides definitely decided that a claim for poor-rates fell to be ranked preferably to liquidators' fees and law expenses. The claims of the liquidators were in no better position than the claim of a heritable creditor who had obtained decree in an action of poinding of the ground, and such a claim was postponed to a claim for poor-rates.[1]

The petitioners were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that this case presents any difficulty. It is a case where the liquidators of The Scottish Drug Depot have presented a note in ordinary form to your Lordships' Court, in which they ask that the Court should fix their remuneration and authorise them to take credit therefor and to pay the law expenses of the liquidation, and further, that it should approve of their deliverances as set forth in the schedule, and authorise the payment of the preferential claims and the distribution of the surplus; and finally grant them their discharge. In the schedule appended to the note they set forth that they have admitted to a preferential ranking £117, 9s. 4d. of preferential claims, and among them is included the claim of the collector of poor-rates for the City Parish of Edinburgh, who had put in a claim for unpaid poor-rates, payable on certain property which had been occupied by the Company. The liquidators set forth that they have sufficient funds and propose to pay all the preferential claims in full. The that the parochial rates and the debts specified shall, 'subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs of administration or otherwise, be discharged forthwith so far as the assets of the company are sufficient to meet them.'

"That enactment does not support the collector's contention that the parochial rates fall to be paid preferably to the liquidators' fees, and the expenses incurred by them. These appear to me to fall within the words 'the costs of administration.' The rates, however, are, subject to retention of the amount necessary to meet the costs of administration, to be paid 'forthwith.' That I take to mean that they shall be paid out of the first funds available for division.

"In the present case the circumstances were these:—The Company had carried on business as chemists and druggists, having their principal place of business at Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, and having seven branches in various places in Edinburgh and Leith. The liquidators deemed it to be advisable, in order that the assets of the Company might be realised to the best advantage, to carry on the business for a certain time, and the Court authorised them to do so until Whitsunday 1904. The present note was presented on 10th January 1905, and the liquidators stated that they had then realised the businesses and all other assets of the Company.

"The winding-up order was not pronounced until 19th February 1904, so that I do not think, considering the nature of the assets, that there has been any delay in realisation, and I am not surprised that the liquidators did not deem it expedient to make any division of the funds until the whole estate was realised.

"It may be that the liquidators were, at a somewhat earlier date, in possession of funds out of which the rates and other debts which the Act of 1888 directs to be paid 'forthwith' might have been paid, and it may be that to have paid them at an earlier date would have been more in accordance with the directions of the statute. I have, however, no information upon that point, and I do not think it necessary to inquire, as all the preferable debts will be paid in full."

collector has put in answers in which he sets forth this claim, amounting to £20, 0s. 6½d., and then sets forth the clause from the Poor-Law Act of 1845, providing for the preferential payment of such claims. He then states that he has put in a claim for preferential payment, and goes on to refer to the prayer of the liquidators' note, and asks the Court to ordain the liquidators to pay his claim out of the first proceeds of the estate, and preferably to all debts of a private nature, and in particular, preferably to the liquidators' fees and law expenses incurred by them, and to rank his claim accordingly.

He therefore not only asks for payment of his debt, but asks for it with the epithetical addendum that it should be paid out of the first proceeds of the estate. I call it an epithetical addendum, because it is distinctly stated by the liquidators in their replies, and not denied by the collector's counsel, that the collector was informed that he would be paid in full before he lodged his answers to the note. I think the question of payment out of first proceeds can only arise when there is a competition as to the funds, but cannot arise here when payment in full of all these claims is tendered. I do not think a litigant can come here and ask us to answer a question which does not arise in his case, but which may arise in some other case. I consider that is a preposterous request. I further think that as the applicant has driven the liquidators into litigation, both here and in the Outer-House, he must pay the expenses of both discussions. The question having been raised in the Outer-House, the Lord Ordinary has been induced to make a pronouncement on the question of preferential payments, though it was unnecessary for the decision of the point before him. I would prefer that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it deals with the Bankruptcy Act of 1888, as such a finding is unnecessary for the disposal of this case, and I think it better that a finding should not be allowed to stand which deals with a point that does not arise on the facts of the case that the Court has to decide.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, and have no doubt at all. The claimant Fraser may have an interest to have the question now raised settled, but he can have no interest to have it decided in this particular case. The question should be determined in a case where it properly arises for decision. I do not think that a collector who desires to have some legal question decided is entitled to fix upon a particular estate, where the liquidator has plenty of funds and no objection to pay the debt, and to burden it with the expenses of carrying on an unnecessary litigation for the benefit of the community.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that every unprejudiced person would be ready to admit that in a bankruptcy or liquidation, where there are funds sufficient to pay twenty shillings in the pound, no question of preferential payment can arise. But, further, where there are degrees of ranking among those entitled to preferential payment, if there are sufficient funds to pay all the preferential debts in full, no competition can arise between the preferential creditors of different orders. That is precisely the case we have to consider, and I therefore think the collector's contention is untenable.

Liquidators of Scottish Drug Depot, Limited, v. Fraser.

I agree with your Lordship that, although the Lord Ordinary has given his opinion on the question of the order of the preferential payments, that part of his Lordship's interlocutor is not necessary for the disposal of the matter of the action, and should be recalled. If it were to stand, the judgment might be cited as an authority on the point, and I do not think that a decision should be allowed to go out as an authority when the point it purports to decide does not really arise on the facts of the case.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: "Find that in respect that the liquidators have admitted the claim for poor-rates to a preferential ranking and tendered payment thereof in full, there is no proper question presented to the Court for adjudication on the answers, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed: Find the reclaimer liable in expenses of the reclaiming note, and also the expenses incurred by the liquidators in the Outer-House in connection with the answers . . . and the replies . . . and decern."

*Expenses—Taxation — Fees to Skilled Witnesses — Certificate—Action settled before trial—A. JAMES CLEMENTS, Inland Revenue officer, Edinburgh, brought an action against the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Edinburgh, in which he concluded for payment of £2000 as damages for the death of his son, which was caused by the collapse of a bridge which he alleged was the property of the defenders and under their sole charge and control, and at the time of the accident was being taken down by the defenders with a view to reconstruction.

Issues were adjusted for the trial of the cause by jury, but before the trial the action was settled, the pursuer accepting an extrajudicial tender of £500, with expenses as taxed.

The nature of the case averred by the pursuer was such as to require engineering and medical skilled evidence.

In taxing the pursuer's account of expenses, the Auditor disallowed a sum of £14, 9s. for investigations and examinations made by one civil engineer and two medical men with a view to trial.*

The pursuer lodged objections to the Auditor's report, and argued;—The charges of £14, 9s. taxed off by the Auditor, should be allowed. The Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876 could only apply where the case had gone to trial. The pursuer was entitled to just and reasonable expenses for investigations by experts.[1] No doubt Lord M'Laren's opinion in Turnbull v. North British Railway Company,[2] was to the contrary, but the weight of authority[1] and the practice[3] was in favour of the pursuer's contention. If the Auditor was right, then if a case was abandoned just before trial, the defenders could get no expenses under this head, however reasonable and necessary the outlay had been.

Argued for the defenders;—In any view, the pursuer could not take any benefit from the Act of Sederunt, which only provided for the previous expenses of witnesses examined at the trial. Apart from the Act of Sederunt he was not entitled to anything. By the Act of Sederunt 10th July 1844, which as regards this matter was in the same terms as the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876, such charges were allowed as an exception to the general rule, and subject to a condition. The maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius applied. There was no trace prior to 1844 of such charges being allowed. The authorities on the point were two contrary obiter dicta,[1] of which the later in date was in the defenders' favour. The case of Lord Elphinstone[2] founded on by the pursuer, did not apply. That was a case where the proof was led before one of the Judges of the Division, which had the advantage of his opinion upon the matter. So far as could be discovered Lord Ormidale's opinion in M'Dougall[3] had been followed in the practice of the Auditor until the case of Turnbull[4] was decided. The view taken by Lord M'Laren in Turnbull[4] was the right one. It was impossible, where there had been no trial, to say whether charges for investigations were just and reasonable or not.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is quite plain that this is not a case falling under the Act of Sederunt. The Act of Sederunt provides for a certificate being granted with regard to expert witnesses by the Judge who tried the cause. But this case never went to trial, and the question is whether in these circumstances such a certificate is required. Issues had been adjusted, and from that point onward the case was not before any Judge in particular. It might have been enrolled before the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for trial, or it might have come before the Lord President or the Lord Justice-Clerk, or before some other Judge appointed to try the case at the sittings. But till the trial there was no Judge from whom it would have been possible to obtain the certificate. And further, the certificate referred to by the Act of Sederunt is a certificate regarding witnesses who have been examined, not witnesses who might have been examined if the trial had gone on. So, I think that this case is altogether outside the Act of Sederunt, and that no certificate is required when the case has been settled before going to trial. When the case is settled on the footing that the pursuer is to get his expenses, I think any question as to what such expenses include falls to be decided according to the ordinary practice of the Court, with the assistance of the Auditor, and that the pursuer will be entitled to get his ordinary and proper charges according to the circumstances of the case. Here the Auditor has said that the fees in question are moderate, both as to the number and class of the witnesses for whom they are charged and as regards the amounts charged. The matter was really one for his decision, and, as he has reported that the charges are proper and moderate, I think they should be allowed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. The Act of Sederunt plainly does not apply. We are consequently thrown back upon the rule which would have applied if the Act of Sederunt had not been passed. And the only such rule of which I know is, that a successful litigant who is found entitled to expenses shall get the expenses incurred by him according to what is just and reasonable in the circumstances. I think, therefore, the Auditor in this case was quite entitled to allow such payments as he thought just and reasonable for expert witnesses.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I entirely concur, and I adopt your Lordship's opinion.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur.

Expenses—Awarding—Modification—Jury Trial—Appeal from Sheriff Court for Jury Trial—Small amount awarded.—In an action for £500 of damages at common law, or £249 under the Employers Liability Act, for personal injuries, proof was allowed in the Sheriff Court. On appeal by the pursuer the Court of Session sent the case to trial by jury. The defenders did not move to have the case remitted to the Sheriff Court. The jury awarded £35 of damages. The defenders, who had made no tender, moved that expenses to the pursuer should be subject to modification in respect that the case, as tested by the amount of damages awarded, should properly have been tried in the Sheriff Court. Held that the pursuer was entitled to expenses without modification.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THIS action was brought in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow at the instance of William Ridley, metal polisher, Glasgow, against Kimball & Morton, Limited, machine makers, Glasgow, for £500 of damages at common law, or £249 under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for personal injuries sustained by the leather on a revolving buff—a wooden wheel covered on the circumference with leather—coming loose and hitting him on the head.

The pursuer averred that the force of the blow caused concussion of the brain, which rendered him unconscious; that he did not recover consciousness until the afternoon of the day following the accident; that his head was severely cut and bruised, and that he was permanently disfigured and his health permanently impaired; and that he had not since the accident been able to follow any employment.

The Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) allowed a proof. On appeal by the pursuer for jury trial the Court sent the case to trial by jury. The defenders did not move to have it remitted to the Sheriff Court.

The case was tried before Lord Kyllachy and a jury.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £35. No tender had been made by the defenders.

The pursuer moved the Court to apply the verdict and find him entitled to expenses.

The defenders moved that expenses to the pursuer should be subject to modification.

Argued for the defenders;—The sum awarded as damages was a mere fraction of the sum claimed, and the smallness of the award was a sufficient reason for modifying the expenses. The case was one which should properly have been disposed of in the Sheriff Court in Glasgow (where all the witnesses were resident), and was not one in which the defenders should have been subjected to the expense of a jury trial. The circumstances favouring modification of expenses were stronger in the present case than in many cases in which the expenses had been modified.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—In appealing for jury trial the pursuer had merely exercised his statutory right. The circumstances of the case were such as to make the case appropriate for trial by jury. In determining the amount of his claim a pursuer must have regard to what he thought was reasonable reparation, and could not be expected to anticipate the sum which a jury might award him. There had been no tender by the defenders, and they had not moved to have the case remitted to the Sheriff.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The motion before the Court is to modify the expenses, upon the ground that the sum which was recovered was £35, and, that being so, the pursuer ought not to have the full expenses of the jury trial. Such cases as this appear to have been dealt with in various ways. I do not think it expedient to lay down any rule that can be rigidly applied to them all, and I should not be disposed to do anything which might cast doubt on the power of the Court to deal with expenses according to its discretion in each particular case. But on the general question of procedure it seems to me that the Court ought to be guided by Act of Parliament; and where Parliament has dealt with the matter, it is not for us to do something which is tantamount to altering the law. It would not be impossible to reconcile the decisions in the various cases which have been cited to us, although it might not be possible to reconcile some of the opinions which have been expressed in these cases. But judging, as I propose to do, each case by itself, it seems that here we are dealing with a case which in its nature was quite appropriate for jury trial. The pursuer having, according to his statutory right, asked for a jury trial, I think we should give expenses in the ordinary way.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—In this particular case I do not think that the circumstances are strong for the modification of expenses. I understand your Lordships wish to consider the question on general grounds, and with regard to the difference in practice between this and the Second Division of the Court. I feel bound to say that in my opinion the Second Division are entirely within their powers in laying down the rule with respect to the numerous cases under the Employers Liability Act, which are of small value and really not suitable for jury trial, that they should be kept within bounds by the application of the power of the Court to modify expenses. The Court has at common law complete control over expenses, and has established two scales of taxation in the Sheriff Court by Act of Sederunt. Without the formality of an Act of Sederunt I see no difficulty in treating questions of taxation in our own Court according to a definite rule, provided we apply the rule consistently. We do not claim to exercise an arbitrary discretion in the matter of expenses more than in any other matter. I am the more inclined to think that the practice of the Second Division should be followed, because in the Employers Liability Act we have a clear indication how appeals of small value are to be dealt with. That Act, by the sixth section, provides that any action brought under its provisions may be removed to the Court of Session at the instance of either party in the manner provided by, and subject to the conditions prescribed by, section 9 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50). It was held in the case of Paton v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company,[1] that this enactment did not, by implication, exclude the right of appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, as re-enacted by the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 73. I do not understand how that result was arrived at, and indeed I should have thought that where a statute gives a power of appeal subject to a condition, the power could only be exercised subject to that condition. I of course accept the case of Paton.[1] But if it is provided by statute that in a certain class of statutory appeals there is this discretion as to expenses, it would be consistent with sound principle that we should have a similar discretion to deal with expenses in cases which do not fall under the statutory power. I make these observations because it is consistent with my experience and that of your Lordships that many accident cases are brought up here from the Sheriff Court which ought never to have left that Court. That is the opinion I believe of the legal profession in Glasgow, and also to some extent here. I cannot think it right that the provisions of the Employers Liability Act, as to the conditions of the right of appeal, should be reduced to a dead letter by bringing all appeals under the 73d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, instead of under that Act. I think, therefore, that something ought to be done by way of modification of expenses towards suppressing this grave abuse.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with all that the Lord President has said, and therefore, in expressing my own opinion, I need only say, that, in the circumstances of this case, I see no sufficient ground for interfering with the ordinary rule.

THE COURT refused the defenders' motion for modification, and applied the verdict, with expenses.

Such inquiry may be either by proof before a Judge in the Court of Session, or by proof before the Sheriff; and in deciding between the two methods the Court will keep in view, in relation to the nature of the case, that the one course will, and the other will not, allow of ultimate appeal to the House of Lords on the facts. (2) In deciding whether a case is or is not suitable for jury trial it will apply the same criterion as it does in cases raised before itself. That is to say, it will consider whether the action is of the class specially appropriated by statute to jury trial, and if so, whether there is any special cause for not so trying it. And further, as to amount, it will be guided by the standard fixed by the Legislature, viz., £40, so that unless the action on the face of it discloses a claim which, in the opinion of the Court, could not reasonably be entitled to a verdict amounting to more than £40, it will not refuse a jury trial to an otherwise appropriate case.

1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

In December 1904, Cecilia Sharples, laundry worker, Govan, with the concurrence of her father as her curator and administrator-in-law, brought an action against Walter Yuill & Company, proprietors of the Victoria Laundry and Dye Works, Govan, in which she craved decree for £100 as damages at common law for personal injuries sustained by her while in the defenders' employment, or alternatively, for £39 or such other sum as should be found due to her under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred that on 15th November 1904, while in the employment of the defenders, she was proceeding to her work at 6 A.M., and "as was her custom and also the custom of the other workers," had just entered by the gate leading to the defenders' works when she fell into a hole which had been excavated on 14th November, and which had been left open, unfenced, and unlighted, and sustained serious injuries. (Cond 4.) "In addition to a severe shock to her system the pursuer received serious injuries to her arms and body, and particularly to her foot, the sinews of which had been strained in the fall. In consequence of said injuries the pursuer, after being taken home in a cab, was compelled to have constant medical attention, and was ordered complete rest for a period of two months from the date of her receiving the injuries. The injuries to the foot have caused pursuer so much suffering that her general health has become impaired, and it is questionable if the pursuer will ever fully recover from the result of the injuries and shock."

By interlocutor dated 9th February 1905 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and proposed an issue for the trial of the cause by jury.*

* The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 73, enacts:—"It shall be lawful, by note of appeal under this Act, to remove to the Court of Session all causes originating in the inferior Courts in which the claim is in amount above £40, at the time and for the purpose and subject to the conditions specified in the 40th section of the Act 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, and such causes may be remitted to the Outer-House."

6 Geo. Sharples v. Yuill & Co.

On the case being called in the Single Bills the defenders intimated objections to the relevancy, and also asked that, if relevant, the cause should be remitted to the Sheriff Court for proof in respect of its trifling character. The case was sent to the Summar Roll, and it was intimated by the Court that they desired a full discussion upon the question of remitting such cases to the Sheriff, with a view to general rules upon the matter being laid down.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) They maintained that the action was irrelevant at common law, that consequently the action was only for £39, and therefore that it could not competently be appealed under section 40 of the Judicature Act[1] and section 73 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.[2] (2) Even if the action was relevant at common law it ought to be sent back to the Sheriff Court for proof. That was competent.[3] The trifling character of the cause was a sufficient reason for doing so.[4] If it appeared on the face of the record that no jury could reasonably return a verdict for as much as £40 then the case should be remitted to the Sheriff.[5] The present case was ruled by M'Nab v. Fyfe.[6] That was an action of damages for personal injuries like the present. The damage averred here was less than in that case. The case of Cochrane v. Ewing[7] merely decided that it was competent to send cases appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act to proof in the Court of Session, as well as to send them back to the Sheriff.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—This was an ordinary action of damages for personal injuries, and therefore one of the causes enumerated as appropriate for jury trial. It had been competently brought to the Court of Session under section 40 of the Judicature Act.[8] No doubt the Court might remit such cases to the Sheriff Court for proof upon sufficient cause shewn, but the smallness of the amount at stake, if over £40, was not by itself sufficient cause for doing so.[9]

No. 121. At advising,—

May 23, 1905.
Sharples v. Yuill & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by Cecilia Sharples, some time a laundry worker, against the proprietors of the Victoria Laundry, Govan. It concludes for damages for injuries received by her through falling into a hole in the defenders' premises as she was going to work. The damages claimed are put at £100, or alternatively at £39, according as the liability may be found to exist at common law or under the Employers Liability Act.

A proof was ordered in the Sheriff Court, whereupon the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session under the provisions of section 73 of the Court of Session Act, and section 40 of the Judicature Act.

The respondents' counsel, on the case being called in Single Bills, asked that it should be dismissed as irrelevant, or otherwise in respect of the trifling nature of the case that it should be remitted to the Sheriff Court. The pursuer asked for an issue with a view to the case being tried by jury.

As regards the relevancy, I have no doubt. The averment is that an open and unguarded hole was left in the passage through which the girl usually obtained access to her work. That this is a good averment of fault is beyond question, though there may be a good defence on the facts stated by the defenders, who say that that passage was at the time shut up and the girls warned to go another way. But the motion to remit the case to the Sheriff on the ground that it is a case of a trifling character is a motion which recently has been frequently made, and it seemed to me that the matter should be thoroughly discussed with a view to laying down the general rules which will guide this Division of the Court in dealing with such applications. The matter has been dealt with in many decisions, which are in some cases not at first sight very consonant, and which should be referred to some general rule.

An application to this Court for jury trial from the Sheriff Court at the stage at which proof has been ordered in that Court has its origin in the 40th section of the Judicature Act of 1825. That section provided primarily for the finality of findings in fact pronounced by a Division of this Court in cases originating in inferior Courts, and permitted further appeal to the House of Lords only on questions of law, the facts as found by this Court being given the effect of a special verdict of the jury.

The section was in its primary aspect discussed and elucidated by the House of Lords in two cases, viz., Mackay v. Dick & Stevenson,[1] and Shepherd v. Henderson.[2] It, however, concludes with the following proviso: "But it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that in all cases originating in the inferior Courts in which the claim is in amount above £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing a proof has been pronounced in the inferior Courts (unless it be an interlocutor allowing a proof to lie in retentis, or granting diligence for the recovery and production of papers), it shall be competent to either of the parties, or who may conceive that the cause ought to be tried by jury, to remove the process into the Court of Session, by bill of advocation, which shall be passed at once without discussion and without caution; and in case no such bill of advocation shall be presented, and the parties shall proceed to proof under the interlocutor of the inferior Court, they shall be held to have waived their right of appeal to the House of Lords against any judgment which may thereafter be pronounced by the Court of Session, in so far as by such judgment the several facts established by the proof shall be found and declared." This shews that it is not competent to refuse the appeal on the ground that the case is not suited for trial in the Court of Session. It is imperative that the case is to be removed into the Court of Session, and then the question arises, what is to be done with it?

Now, the first question that would naturally arise on this proviso would be whether a remit to the Jury Court (for at this date the Jury Court was a separate Court) was a matter of statutory right as soon as the case had been advocated, or whether the Court of Session were entitled to consider whether the cause was truly suitable for jury trial. Accordingly we find that this question was raised in two cases very soon after the passing of the Act, in both of which it was held that a remit to the Jury Court was not imperative—Sands v. Meffan,[1] Baird v. Officer.[2]

The case of Sands[1] was a case which was obviously unsuited for a jury, but where there were previous interlocutors which the Court held to be wrong, and they accordingly remitted to the Lord Ordinary (advocations at that time being dealt with by the Lord Ordinary) to dispose of these interlocutors. The question of inquiry therefore did not arise. But in Baird's[2] case the point did arise for discussion, how inquiry should be directed—upon the assumption that the case was unsuited for jury trial—and the Lord President and Lord Gillies gave the opinion that if proof was necessary it must be taken in the Court of Session, and could not be remitted to the Sheriff as Sheriff—and accordingly the Division recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, who had remitted the case simpliciter, and ordered him to proceed in the advocation.

That this view remained the view of the Court for some time may be gathered from the fact that this opinion in Baird v. Officer[2] is stated as the law in Mr Macfarlane's work on Jury Trial (published 1837), p. 38, and is repeated in Shand's Practice (published 1848), p. 458.

Neither of these works cite any case trenching on the authority of Baird.[2] At the same time it can hardly be held to have been authoritatively settled, and accordingly we find it treated as a moot point in the next case which I have been able to discover on the subject, viz., Harrington v. Richardson.[3] This case contains an instructive judgment by Lord Ivory on the points arising out of the 40th section. On p. 371 he further says, "whether—the competency being sustained—other questions connected with the future course of procedure may not, as in Sands'[1] case, arise, will be for after consideration."

Lord Rutherfurd took occasion to reaffirm the principle that the removal under the 40th section gave the Court the right to refuse a jury trial and to give effect to prejudicial pleas—but he did not touch on the method of proof if proof were necessary but the case unsuited for jury trial.

Sharples v. Yuill & Co.

The books are silent on the point till we come to the case of Dennistoun v. Rainey & Knox,[1] which was the first case cited at the bar. It may be noted that the case of Campbell v. Campbell,[2] which in this and several of the subsequent cases is cited as an authority, has really nothing to do with the point, being an advocation under 50 George III. cap. 112, section 36. By this time (1871) the Court of Session Act of 1868 had been passed, which abolished advocations and instituted appeals, and specially dealt with advocation under the 40th section of the Judicature Act by section 73, which is in these terms—(His Lordship read the section). Dennistoun's[1] case was therefore the first considered judgment under the new Act. It was an action of interdict at the instance of a riparian owner against certain operations in the bed of a stream. The petitioner appealed for jury trial, but on the appeal being called asked that the case should be tried by a Judge without a jury. The Court (First Division) refused the motion as being against the spirit of the 40th section, in respect that to allow a proof before a Judge would get rid of the finality of facts provisions. As a matter of fact they ordered an issue, but indicated notwithstanding in their opinion that failing an issue (that is to say, if the case had been unsuitable for a jury) the proper course would be to remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof already ordered.

And accordingly they did take that course in the case of Chisholm v. Marshall.[3] The opinion of Lord President Inglis is short and explicit:—"This is a matter on which I have no doubt. The defender is the person who has brought the case here, and he has been quite consistent all through in asking for an issue, but there can be no question that, if we find that the case is not one which can be properly sent to a jury, there is no obligation on us to send it there. Failing that, there are only two courses open to us, either to order the proof to be taken here or to send the case back to the Sheriff. The case of Dennistoun v. Rainey[1] shews that it would be a plain violation of the spirit of section 40 of the Judicature Act to have the proof taken here, and so we must send it back to the Sheriff, before whom the proof will be taken."

In the case of Watson v. Earl of Seafield, only reported in 7 S. L. R. 327, in 1870, the Second Division had sent a case unsuitable for jury trial to proof before one of themselves, and notwithstanding the decision in Chisholm's[3] case the same Division in the next year, finding a case which they considered unsuitable for jury trial, ordered a proof before one of themselves—Laidlaw v. Wilson.[4] Lord Neaves' remarks on the change of circumstances since 1825 are instructive. Lord Ormidale dissented, holding that such a course was contrary to what had been settled in Dennistoun's[1] case. Chisholm's[3] case does not seem to have been cited.

Following on this case a diversity of practice arose between the two Divisions—the First Division following Chisholm's[3] case, and remitting, in all cases where they thought jury trial unsuitable, to the Sheriff, the Second Division appointing proof before one of their own number or a Lord Ordinary. The competency of this latter course being doubted by the Sharples v. Yuill & Co.

First Division they took advantage of the case of Cochrane v. Ewing[1] to send the question to the whole Court. The unanimous opinion of the consulted Judges was as follows :—"We are of opinion that the proof can competently be taken in the Court of Session. We think that by the appeal the case is removed from the Sheriff Court, and that it may be dealt with in the same manner as if it had originated in the Court of Session."

This case then only dealt with and confirmed the competency of proof before a Judge; it did not deal with or touch the competency as an alternative method of remitting to the Sheriff as had been done in Chisholm's[2] case. The first attempt to have a case remitted to the Sheriff and a jury refused on the sole ground of the trifling nature of the action seems to have been made in the subsequent year in the case of Mitchell v. Urquhart.[3] This case also seems to have escaped notice. It was not cited in the discussion, and is not referred to in subsequent decisions, but it is very important, because the report bears that it was advised by the First Division after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division. The judgment of the Lord President is as follows :—"We are of opinion, after consulting with the other Judges, that this case being in its nature one appropriate for jury trial, and the sum at issue being above the limit fixed by the statute, there is no reason why the party appealing should not have the case so tried."

The next case in which a remit was made was the case of Bethune v. Denham,[4] and the case of Mitchell v. Sutherland[5] mentioned in the note. In the argument in Denham's[4] case the expression "trifling" is used, but the ground of judgment was the unsuitability of the case in itself for trial by jury.

This was followed by the case of Nicol v. Picken.[6] The rubric in this case is obviously wrong, and is probably answerable for some of the false ideas that followed. But the same view as had prevailed in Mitchell v. Urquhart[3] was again affirmed by the First Division the next year in Willison v. Petherbridge,[7] and reaffirmed the succeeding year in Johnstone v. Hughan.[8]

We do not propose to go through in detail the causes in which since that date remits have been made to the Sheriff. They are perhaps not altogether consistent. But nearly all can be properly referred to the opinion that the cases were in themselves unsuitable for jury trial. Many of them were in fact trifling, and that circumstance, helped by the erroneous rubric in Nicol v. Picken,[6] has probably given rise to the idea which is embodied in the motion now made before us, that because a case is small in its amount it ought to be remitted to the Sheriff. And at least in some of them the idea is actively contested, as for example in the judgment of Lord Adam in the case of Dickie v. The Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, Limited.[9] "In this case the sum claimed is £50, so that ex facie this is a perfectly competent appeal under the Judicature Act. But a motion has been made by the defenders that the case should be remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute in Glasgow, to be tried in the Sheriff Court there, on the ground that it is of such a trifling nature that it would be more appropriately dealt with in that manner. Now, as to the competency of such a course of action there can be no doubt. It is perfectly competent for us to send the case to a jury, to try it ourselves, or to remit it back to the Sheriff-substitute. But when the Judicature Act has definitely fixed the sum to entitle the pursuer to a jury trial at £40, I do not think it right that we should fix it at any other figure. At the same time I quite admit that if it had appeared on the face of the pleadings that the case was in reality a trumpery case, and that the sum sued for had been raised to £40 merely for the purpose of bringing it within the provisions of the Act, I should not, in such a case, hesitate to send it back to the Sheriff Court, even though the sum sued for were very much larger than the statutory amount. Now, the test that must be applied is just this: Are the facts as pleaded such that no jury could be reasonably expected to award so large a sum of damages as £40? I cannot say that that appears to be the nature of the case now before us. Here we have a young man meeting with an accident, and suffering an injury to his foot, which resulted, after a few weeks treatment, in partial amputation. So this is the case of a young man who has been permanently mutilated, and I cannot say that I consider a case such as that a light one. If a jury saw fit to assess the damages at £40, I would not be prepared to say that that must of necessity be an unreasonable verdict. Such, then, being the circumstances of the case now before us, I cannot see my way to hold that it ought to be sent back to the Sheriff."

The principles to be deduced from the authorities are clear, and may be summarised thus: (1) When a case is appealed for jury trial the Court is not bound to grant a jury trial, but may either (a) decide the case on any legal ground which will allow the case to be disposed of without inquiry, or (b) order inquiry by some other method than jury trial, if it considers jury trial unsuitable. Such inquiry may be either by proof before a Judge in the Court of Session, or by proof before the Sheriff; and in deciding between the two methods the Court will keep in view, in relation to the nature of the case, that the one course will, and the other will not, allow of ultimate appeal to the House of Lords on the facts. (2) In deciding whether a case is or is not suitable for jury trial it will apply the same criterion as it does in cases raised before itself. That is to say, it will consider whether the action is of the class specially appropriated by statute to jury trial, and if so, whether there is any special cause for not so trying it. And further, as to amount it will be guided by the standard fixed by the Legislature, viz., £40, so that unless the action on the face of it discloses a claim which, in the opinion of the Court, could not reasonably be entitled to a verdict amounting to more than £40, it will not refuse a jury trial to an otherwise appropriate case.

The application of these views to the present case is that we shall allow an issue with the view of the case being tried by jury.

That is the judgment of the Court, and the Judges of the other Division have been consulted and agree with this opinion.

"Kyanite," finding herself in dangerous proximity to the "Buccleuch," a ship under sail, whose lights were inadequate, and being unable to tell what the course of the sailing ship was, starboarded her helm in order to turn away from the sailing ship, and continued to go full speed ahead. This brought the "Kyanite" across the course of the "Buccleuch," and, two or three minutes after the "Buccleuch" was first sighted by the "Kyanite," a collision took place, the stem of the "Buccleuch" striking the "Kyanite" on the starboard side, nearly amidships.

In cross actions of damages, held (1) that although the "Kyanite" did in fact depart from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, by crossing the course of the "Buccleuch," she, being wholly unaware of the course of the latter owing to her inadequate lights, was not chargeable with fault in respect of this departure from the regulations; but (2) that the "Kyanite" was to be held at fault in respect that she had infringed article 23 of the regulations by failing to stop and reverse in the short space of time after she sighted the sailing ship, and had failed to discharge the onus which lay on her of shewing that her failure to comply with this article of the regulations was excusable, by proving either that her departure from the regulations was the only chance of escaping a collision, or that the risk of collision would have been increased by obeying the regulations.

IN November and December 1903 George Windram and others, owners of the iron sailing ship "Buccleuch" of Liverpool, and William Robertson, owner of the s.s. "Kyanite," of Glasgow, raised cross actions of damages, concluding respectively for £3000 and £10,000, on account of a collision between these two vessels, which occurred on 17th October 1903 in the English Channel between Folkestone and Dover. The actions were conjoined. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

In the action at their instance the owners of the "Buccleuch" averred that on the evening of 17th October 1903 the "Buccleuch" was proceeding eastwards on a voyage from Falmouth to Amsterdam under all plain sail, and, about 7.45 P.M., in clear weather, those on board sighted the "Kyanite" approaching her some miles off on the port bow. (Cond. 3) "The lights of the 'Buccleuch' were burning brightly, and her port light was visible to any person keeping a proper lookout on the 'Kyanite.'" (Cond. 4) "The vessels were then approaching each other in a direction which seemed to involve a risk of collision if each kept on its course, and it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel. Nevertheless the 'Kyanite' continued upon her course, by which she was being brought nearer to the 'Buccleuch.' Thereupon, in order to still further warn those on board the 'Kyanite' of the proximity of his vessel, the master of the 'Buccleuch' burned a blue flare light on the port side of his ship . . ." (Cond. 5) "When within about 150 yards of the 'Buccleuch' the helm of the 'Kyanite' was suddenly put to starboard, which had the effect of taking her directly across the bows of the 'Buccleuch,' and of making a collision between the vessels inevitable. The master of the 'Buccleuch' tried to avert a collision by putting his helm hard-a-starboard; but before this operation could take effect upon his vessel's course the vessels collided," the stem of the "Buccleuch" striking the "Kyanite" on the starboard side nearly amidships.

The owner of the "Kyanite" answered;—(Ans. 3) "Denied that the 'Buccleuch's' lights were burning so as to be visible to any vessel approaching her. . . ." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that the 'Kyanite' kept on her course, as, owing to the absence of lights on board the 'Buccleuch,' those on board the 'Kyanite' had no reason to anticipate any danger until the 'Buccleuch' suddenly loomed up close on her starboard bow. Quoad ultra denied." (Ans. 5) "Admitted that immediately after seeing the loom of the 'Buccleuch' the 'Kyanite' starboarded her helm in order to try and run clear of the 'Buccleuch,' which was then the only possible chance of safety for both vessels. Owing, however, to the proximity of the 'Buccleuch,' and to the fact that the latter improperly starboarded her helm and came to port, the collision could not be avoided."

The owners of the "Buccleuch" further averred;—(Cond. 6) "The said collision was caused by the fault of those in charge of the 'Kyanite.' Instead of directing their course so as to keep out of the way of the 'Buccleuch,' as it was their duty to do, they navigated their steamer so as to bring her directly across the course of the sailing vessel, and thereafter, in breach of Rule 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, they attempted to cross ahead of her. Had they, instead of attempting to cross ahead, ported the 'Kyanite's' helm instead of starboarding it, the pursuers believe and aver that the collision would have been avoided. Further, upon approaching the 'Buccleuch,' it was the duty of the 'Kyanite' to stop and reverse, which she failed to do. The pursuers also believe and aver that no proper lookout was kept on board the 'Kyanite' prior to the said collision. The defender's servants were thus guilty of breach of the rules of good seamanship, and of the Articles for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, particularly Articles 20, 22, 23, and 29." *

* The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made by Order in Council of 27th November 1896, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 418, are, inter alia, as follows:—

Art. 20. "When a steam vessel and a sailing vessel are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steam vessel shall keep out of the way of the sailing vessel."

Art. 21. "Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed."

Art. 22. "Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other."

Art. 23. "Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse."

Art. 27. "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

Windram v. Robertson.

The answer was in these terms;—(Ans. 6) "The collision was caused solely by the fault of those in charge of the 'Buccleuch.' Her lights were defective, either being out altogether or having become invisible. In consequence, those in charge of the 'Kyanite' were not aware of the proximity of the 'Buccleuch' until it was too late to avoid a collision. Those in charge of the 'Kyanite' did everything possible to avoid the collision by directing her course to port as aforesaid. The collision might have been avoided had it not been that the 'Buccleuch' starboarded her helm immediately before the collision, and so ran into the 'Kyanite.' Those in charge of the 'Buccleuch' were thus guilty of breach of the rules of good seamanship and of the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and particularly of Articles 1, 2, 5, 21, and 29 thereof."

The owners of the "Buccleuch" pleaded;—(1) The said collision having occurred through the fault of the servants of the defender on board the "Kyanite," and the pursuers having suffered damage thereby, the defender is liable in reparation.

The owner of the "Kyanite" pleaded;—(1) The collision in question having been caused solely by the fault of those in charge of the pursuers' vessel, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied. (3) Separatim, the collision in question having, in any event, been contributed to by the fault of the pursuers, the loss falls to be apportioned according to Admiralty practice.

The record in the action at the instance of the owner of the "Kyanite" was to a similar effect.

A proof was allowed in the conjoined actions. The proof disclosed that the "Kyanite" before the time of the collision was proceeding on a course S.W. by W. half W., in charge of the mate, Fife. The course of the "Buccleuch" was E. by N., the wind being northerly. The steamship "Ness" was at the time holding the same course as the "Buccleuch," astern of her, on the south side, the other side from the "Kyanite." The other facts disclosed by the proof which are material to this report sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President.

On 12th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the collision between the sailing ship 'Buccleuch' and the steamer 'Kyanite' was caused by fault on the part of those in charge of both vessels," &c. *

* "OPINION.—(After analysing the evidence as to the sufficiency of the lights of the 'Buccleuch,' and coming to the conclusion in fact that they were not sufficient)— . . . I am therefore of opinion that the 'Buccleuch' was in fault, and the next question is whether the 'Kyanite' was not also in fault.

"It is said that there was no proper watch being kept on board the 'Kyanite.' There is one very strong ground for supposing that that was the case, and that is that the mate and lookout never noticed the lights of the 'Ness.' They frankly admitted that that was the case, and said they could not account for it. The mate was extremely honest in his evidence upon the point, because when it was suggested that the lights of the 'Ness' might have been hidden by the 'Buccleuch,' as they were both sailing the same course, he replied,—'If he had seen us, we were bound to see him.'

"Notwithstanding that answer, however, I think that at times, and especially when the vessels were nearing each other, the 'Ness' may have been shut out of view of the 'Kyanite,' and that the fact that neither Fife nor M'Alister saw the lights of the 'Ness' does not necessarily lead to the

The owners of the "Buccleuch" reclaimed.

Argued for the owners of the "Buccleuch," on the question whether the "Kyanite" was at fault;—Those in charge of the "Kyanite" were in fault in (a) starboarding her helm immediately before the collision, and (b) failing to stop and reverse her engines. The starboarding of the helm of the "Kyanite" so as to attempt to cross ahead of the "Buccleuch," was a breach of Rule 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Further, by failing to stop and reverse as they approached the "Buccleuch," those in charge of the "Kyanite" were in breach of Rule 23 of these Regulations. Under Rules 20 and 21, the whole duty of keeping out of the way lay on the "Kyanite," which was a steam vessel, and the "Buccleuch," being a sailing ship, was entitled and bound to keep her course and speed. These rules were absolute, and were disregarded at the peril of those dis-conclusion that they were not looking out at all. I think, however, that the inference is that they were not keeping so constant or keen a watch as they ought to have done, especially in the busy waters of the channel. Further, my impression is that if the 'Ness' had been seen by the 'Kyanite,' the collision would have been avoided. I take it that it would have been the duty of the 'Kyanite' to keep clear of the 'Ness,' and if she had done so she would probably have also kept clear of the 'Buccleuch.' That, however, is by no means clear upon the evidence, and I need not consider the point further, because, in my opinion, the 'Kyanite' was otherwise plainly in fault. I refer to the manœuvre which she adopted when she sighted the 'Buccleuch.'

"Fife then put his helm to starboard, and continued to go at full speed ahead. That, as it happened, was the very worst thing which he could have done, because it took him right across the bows of the 'Buccleuch.' Captain Cowie, a gentleman of great experience, said that it would have been a proper thing for Fife to port his helm. That opinion, I think, was given in view of the fact that the 'Kyanite' and the 'Buccleuch' were crossing ships, and that it was the duty of the former to give way. But at the time Fife did not know that the 'Buccleuch' was a crossing ship. He had no idea in what direction she was sailing. All that he knew was that a ship under sail was in dangerously close proximity. In such circumstances I think that his duty was to stop and reverse. That was the one course which, I think, he could not have been wrong in following. What he did do was fatal if, as it turned out, the 'Buccleuch' was a crossing ship.

"Fife said that to have stopped and reversed would not have avoided the collision, because there was not time for the change in the motion of the engines to take effect. Whether that opinion is well founded or not depends upon how far the 'Buccleuch' was distant when Fife sighted her. He says that only half a minute elapsed before the collision. I think that that is an underestimate. After Fife sighted the 'Buccleuch' her master burned a blue light. The master says that the light had burned out some time before the collision, and other members of the crew say the same thing. The master of the 'Ness,' however, says that it was still burning when the collision occurred. I think that the inference from the whole evidence is that the light had very nearly, but not quite, burned out at the time of the collision. Now, it appears that a blue light of the kind burns for several minutes, and accordingly I do not think that less than two or three minutes could have elapsed between the time when Fife sighted the 'Buccleuch' and the collision. Now, Captain Cowie says that a steamer can be stopped from full speed ahead in less than one minute, and therefore if the order to stop and reverse had been given immediately the 'Buccleuch' was sighted, not only might the way of the 'Kyanite' have been stopped before the time when the collision took place, but the reverse action of the engines regarding them.*[1] The owner of the "Kyanite" had failed to shew —and the onus was entirely on him—that the circumstances of the case made departure from the Regulations necessary. Even if the reason put forward by those on board the "Kyanite" for starboarding her helm—viz., that they did not know that the "Buccleuch" was a crossing ship—was valid, it furnished no excuse for their failure to stop and reverse. The "Buccleuch" was seen, or ought to have been seen, before the ships were in the agony of a collision; and there was ample time for the "Kyanite"—a much longer time than was considered sufficient in the case of the "Khedive"[1]—to realise the situation and obey the rule as to stopping and reversing. If the "Kyanite," in obedience to the rules, had ported her helm and stopped and reversed, a collision would have been avoided.

Argued for the owner of the "Kyanite";—The sole cause of the collision was the misconduct of those on board the "Buccleuch" in having defective lights. Owing to this misconduct the ships were brought into a position of extreme peril, and, in that situation, even if it was an error on the part of the "Kyanite" to starboard her helm and not stop and reverse, it was an error due not to her fault, but to the fault of the "Buccleuch." The owner of the "Kyanite" was not liable for a breach of the rules which had been committed by those in charge of her endeavouring to do their best in the position of peril in which the "Buccleuch" had placed her.[2] When the "Buccleuch" suddenly loomed up on the starboard bow of the "Kyanite," those on board the "Kyanite" did not know that the "Buccleuch" was a crossing ship, and, that being so, it was an act of ordinary skill and care on the part of those in charge of the "Kyanite" to starboard her helm, and so try to clear the "Buccleuch."[3] A collision would thereby have been averted if the "Buccleuch" had not suddenly starboarded her helm. If the rule as to stopping and reversing had been followed, the effect would have been, with a right-handed screw, to turn the prow of the "Kyanite" to starboard, and so increase the risk of a collision. That fact in itself was sufficient to excuse the "Kyanite" for not following Rule 23.[4] Under Rule 23 the "Kyanite" was bound to stop and reverse only "if necessary," and if it was shewn by a ship that to stop and reverse in compliance with might have come into operation. Further, the master of the 'Buccleuch' had very properly thrown his ship's head up into the wind, which stopped her way, and if Fife had stopped and reversed, the probabilities are, so far as I can judge, that the collision would not have taken place.

"I am therefore of opinion that the 'Kyanite,' as well as the 'Buccleuch,' was in fault."

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 419 (4), enacts:—"Where, in a case of collision, it is proved to the Court before which the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulations have been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

Rule 23 would have increased the risk, then Rule 27 was applicable, and non-compliance with Rule 18 would not cause the ship to be held in fault.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an important case, and it has been very well argued before your Lordships. I do not think I need to recapitulate the circumstances of the case, because being fresh in your Lordships' memory, as far as you are concerned, they are for others exceedingly well explained in the very careful judgment of the Lord Ordinary which is the subject of this reclaiming note. That reclaiming note, presented by the owners of the "Buccleuch," has been taken advantage of by the owners of the "Kyanite," so that your Lordships have to consider the question of whether either or both of these vessels was in fault.

Now, so far as the manœuvre is concerned, I do not think there has been any doubt (it is not contested even in the speeches of counsel) that so far as the "Buccleuch" was concerned, she is not to blame. The "Buccleuch" was a sailing ship, and as such she was entitled under the regulations to have steamers keep out of her way, and upon the approach of any steamer her proper proceeding was to hold her course. She did hold her course, and although at the very last moment she did execute the manœuvre of turning her head into the wind, she being at that time sailing very close to the wind, with the view of stopping, nobody says that she was not perfectly right in doing so; indeed, it did not alter her holding her course. But, then, there is the question of whether she on that night was sufficiently provided with lights so as to allow a steamer which was meeting her to see her in time to get out of her way. (His Lordship reviewed the evidence on the question of lights.)

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the lights on the "Buccleuch" on that occasion were not lights that were in accordance with the requirements of the collision regulations, and that in that matter the "Buccleuch" was in fault. Now, of course, if that is so, that prevents the "Buccleuch" recovering against the "Kyanite."

We have now to consider the question of the "Kyanite." On this branch of the case I am bound to say I have not personally felt any difficulty. I think the Lord Ordinary is clearly right, although I am not inclined to put much stress on what he alludes to in part of his judgment, I mean the supposed error in crossing the other ship's course. If we start with the assumption of the facts which I hold to be proved, namely, that the other ship had not adequate lights, although she had lights, the "Kyanite" found itself in dangerous proximity to something ahead, without being able to tell what the course of that something was. Of course we know the fact now, which is, that the "Kyanite" did cross the course of the "Buccleuch," which in itself would be an improper manœuvre, but I do not think that she can be charged with any breach of the regulations, because, as has been often said in such cases, and, indeed, is quite obvious, you cannot in the proper sense of the word, break a regulation unless you know to what the regulation applies. I do not think those on the "Kyanite" knew what the other vessel's course was, or could know. The regulation which I think was contravened was article 23d for not stopping and reversing.

There was cited a good deal of authority upon this matter, and I am bound to say that I think the authority as determined by the judgment of the House of Lords is perfectly clear. The leading case is undoubtedly the case of the "Khedive,"[1] and the subsequent cases of the "Benares"[2] and "Memnon"[3] are not at variance with that authority. The "Benares"[2] was not in a Court which could overrule the House of Lords. The "Memnon"[3] was in the House of Lords, which does not overrule its own judgments. I think the two cases are perfectly in accordance with the case of the "Khedive."[1] The judgment in that case was a very important one. Lord Blackburn in delivering the leading opinion in the House of Lords says as plainly as he can say that so far from the manœuvre in the case of the "Khedive"[1] being a bad manœuvre, it probably was the best thing that could be done, and as matter of fact probably saved great loss of life, because he came to the conclusion that the manœuvre which was performed had the effect of bringing about a collision between the two ships side to side, whereas if that manœuvre had not been performed one ship would have sent the other to the bottom, and he held that, as a seaman, the unfortunate captain could not have done anything better than he did. Lord Blackburn felt it necessary to lay down as the law that the real meaning of these rules of collision at sea was not that they were hints to people as to what they had best do in a certain condition of circumstances, but that they were absolute rules to be disregarded at the peril of those disregarding them, and the breach of which was only to be excused if a case of absolute necessity was made out. Now, there were cited some authorities both in the English Courts and in this Court before the "Khedive."[1] I cannot help thinking that the mistake, which is a very common mistake, is that a generality is taken, and that the generality is too widely expressed, because there is nothing, I think, in the actual decisions of those earlier cases which seems to me inconsistent with the "Khedive."[1] I think I cannot do better to illustrate what I mean than by taking the case of Hine Brothers in this Court in 15 R., p. 498, where the dictum of Lord Justice James in the "Bywell Castle"[4] is quoted with approval. Let me remind your Lordships of the circumstances in the case of Hine[5] which were these: a large steamer called the "Horatio" was proceeding in the River Clyde on the wrong side of the river. It met a barge going in the opposite direction, which barge was upon the same side of the river, and therefore, of course, its right side. The barge, seeing that this large steamer was coming right down upon it, and reflecting that in the impending collision the damage to it would be very much worse if it were to go straight on, crossed to the other or wrong side. Almost at the same moment the "Horatio" changed its course, and went over to its own right side of the river, with the result that a collision happened. It was maintained by the "Horatio" that the barge could not recover against the "Horatio" because the barge was at the time of the collision admittedly transgressing the rule by going to the wrong side. It was held, and I think perfectly rightly, that it was not in the mouth of the "Horatio" to say that, because it was the "Horatio's" own mistake that had caused the barge to go there. The general proposition which Lord Justice James in somewhat similar circumstances laid down in the case of the "Bywell Castle"[1] was quoted with approval by the Lord Justice-Clerk in this case. His Lordship said,—"I desire to add my opinion that a ship has no right by its own misconduct to put another ship into circumstances of extreme peril, and then charge that other ship with misconduct." That seems to me to be too absolute a proposition. Where your own misconduct leads directly to the breaking of a rule, it is true. But otherwise the true position is well laid down in the case of the "Khedive."[2] These rules are things which cannot be broken except at your own peril.

With regard to the "Benares,"[3] the facts of that case may be taken from the rubric,—"A steamer, the G., saw a green light at some distance and starboarded her helm. Soon after the port side of the B., without a red light, came into view so close that the only chance of avoiding a collision was for the G. to continue at full speed ahead and starboard her helm, which she did. The B. struck the G. on her starboard side. Held that the B. was alone to blame for the collision, and that article 18 of the regulations did not apply under the circumstances to the G., and that article 23 was applicable." Now, the Master of the Rolls (Brett) in deciding that case dealt with the question, whether there had not been a breach of the regulations. He said,—"By article 18, if there was nothing else in the circumstances, he ought to have stopped and reversed. But the rules of navigation are contained not in one article, but in all the articles, and article 23 is as much to be observed as article 18." One must construe that sentence by getting hold of the rules that were then in operation, which were not the rules we are dealing with now, so that numbers are misleading if taken without considering the rules to which they apply. Article 18 of those days is article 23 nowadays. Article 23 which the Master of the Rolls (Brett) mentions is not article 23 now.* Article 18 of the Rules of 1879 was in these terms,—"Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary." In the case of the "Benares"[3] it was held to be made out on the facts that continuing full speed ahead and starboarding the helm was a necessary manœuvre to take, the only chance of escape. That is not inconsistent with the judgment in the "Khedive"[2] case. That judgment summarised is this: In impending danger of any sort you are entitled to a moment's hesitation in order that you may bring to your mind whether the rules apply or whether they do not, but once having that moment of hesitation you are then bound to follow the rule. If you do not follow the rule, you neglect it at your own peril. You may be able, as a matter of proof, the onus being upon you, to shew that, following the rule, you would have increased the risk of collision, and that I think is the sentence that is quoted from the Lord Chancellor's judgment to us in the case of the "Memnon."[1] The onus is upon you, and if you do not discharge it, then you cannot be excused if you have not followed the rule. That is surely not only common sense, but is very much accentuated when you have the state of the facts such as we find them in that case. I can understand that when a man is in a position where he sees that there is a chance of safety, it may be right that in what has been called the agony of the collision you are not to hold him too hard because he did his best. Although even there, in the light of the authorities that I have quoted, I think he would need to shew not only that he did what he thought was best, but what other seamen would think was best for the purpose of avoiding a collision. But if a person, through no fault of his own, is in a state, from the circumstances of the case, in which he cannot tell what is the right and proper manœuvre, then more than ever, it seems to me, he is absolutely bound to stick to the rules and to leave them at his own peril.

Now, applying these rules to this case, I do not think there is much doubt. Of course it is impossible to be very precise as to what distance off the "Kyanite" saw or ought to have seen the "Buccleuch," on the view that I have submitted to your Lordships that the "Buccleuch" had a light, although a bad one. Then, there is also the question of the time that was taken to burn the blue flare. I do not think it is necessary to go through evidence particularly upon that, but undoubtedly a blue flare did begin to burn before the collision. There was a small space of time given to the captain or the mate of the "Kyanite" in which to act. I may remind your Lordships of how extraordinarily small the time was that was given in the case of the "Khedive";[1] it was only from a minute to a minute and a half, and yet there the captain was found to have been wrong in leaving the rules. In this case I cannot doubt that there was a small space of time in which to act, and that the person in charge had no certainty that any manœuvre would lead him to safety. The manœuvre that he took had this in its favour, that he saw something on the starboard bow, and that consequently he starboarded his helm, sending his ship to port, which of course would turn him away from the object he saw, but which had the effect of making him cross the bows of the other vessel. But it is not on the question of his helm that I think he is liable or wrong; it is entirely on the question of not stopping and reversing his engines. The learned counsel tried very hard to shew that he was right in not doing so, because the effect of a right-handed screw on reversing the engines is to incline the vessel's head to starboard, and that that was the quarter in which danger appeared. But I have two observations to make on that point. Upon the expert evidence, I do not think that that proposition is at all made out for the "Kyanite"; and secondly, and that is enough for me, it falls enormously short of proving that proposition, the onus of which is upon the "Kyanite"—I mean the proposition that is put by the Lord Chancellor in the case of the "Memnon,"[1] and which I think was held affirmatively in the case of the "Benares."[2] The evidence on that matter stands thus: The expert for the "Buccleuch" states that the proper thing was to have reversed, and in cross-examination this point is put against him by the other side: "Assuming that the light on the sailing vessel is so bad that she is very close on the starboard bow of the steamer before she is visible, and that it is impossible in the dark to tell what course the pursuers' sailing vessel is on, is it not a seamanlike course to keep full speed ahead on a hard-a-starboard helm? (A.) No, his duty was to put his engines full speed astern, and indicate by signal what he was doing." That is the evidence of the pursuers' expert. With regard to this the defender's own expert, Mr Dick, when examined in chief, says, "supposing the ship's sails loomed up at a distance of about 700 feet suddenly on the starboard bow of a steamship, in my opinion a reasonable course for the man in charge of the steamship to pursue would be to turn away from it by starboarding," and in cross-examination at p. 84 B and C, he is asked,—"(Q.) Would it not be the proper thing for a prudent seaman to do, just because he did not know what was the course of the other boat, to stop and reverse? (A.) That would be the one course, but I think the other was a perfectly good course." So that it seems absolutely impossible on that evidence to hold that the onus, which on this matter I hold in accordance with the authorities was on the "Kyanite," has been in the slightest degree discharged. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that on the second branch of the case the Lord Ordinary is right, and I think your Lordships should adhere to his interlocutor.

Lord Adam.—(After dealing with the question of fact as to the condition of the "Buccleuch's" lights, as to which he came to the same conclusion as the Lord President)—On the question as to whether the "Kyanite" was in fault, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the captain acted without any sufficient justification, and in contravention of Article 23, in not stopping and reversing his engines.

On these grounds I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

Lord M'Laren.—(After dealing with the question of fact as to the condition of the "Buccleuch's" lights)—On the question of the liability of the "Kyanite" I agree with your Lordships that the fault of the "Kyanite" consisted in not stopping and reversing. I do not think the owners have been successful in establishing that they come within the very narrow margin of exceptions that is permissible in applying that rule as interpreted by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the "Khedive."[3] The only reason suggested for treating the case as exceptional is that the "Kyanite" was a single screw vessel, and that with a single screw, when the engines are reversed, there is a tendency—I do not think it is put more strongly than that—there is a tendency for the ship's head to turn in one direction or the other according as the pitch of the screw is what is termed right hand or left hand. Now, these regulations are framed by experts, and issued by the Board of Trade. They are authorised by Parliament, and have the force of an Act of Parliament, and the experts who framed those rules were perfectly aware that there are such things as single screws as well as double screws, depending upon the size of the vessel, and if they had thought that the rule did not apply to single screw vessels, they would have said so. I agree with an observation made by your Lordship in the chair, that this tendency, as long as the ship was making forward way, could always be counteracted by the helm. After she ceases to be under way, the object of the manœuvre has been attained, because the vessel is then at a standstill, and a collision is either averted or, at all events, it is diminished as much as possible. I therefore agree that the neglect to stop and reverse the engines was an error of judgment on the part of the mate, which (although possibly in the case of his being tried for mismanagement it would be a good defence) is not a defence which will exempt the owners from liability for negligence.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 4) "Denied that any representations were made by the defenders to the pursuer in the terms condescended upon, or in similar terms. Explained that no guarantee or warranty of any description was, at the date of the contract of sale, or at any time, given by the defenders to the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been induced to purchase the articles referred to in the condescendence through the defenders' false and fraudulent representations as condescended upon, she is entitled to have the contracts rescinded, and to obtain repayment of the sums paid by her for the said articles. (2) The said articles having been sold to the pursuer as antiques, and not being of that description, the pursuer is entitled to reject the same, and to obtain payment of the sums alternatively concluded for. (4) The said transactions being unconscionable, the pursuer is entitled to restitution in integrum.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer and the defenders having entered into valid contracts of sale of the articles condescended upon, and the defenders having duly implemented their part of said contracts, the latter are entitled to absolvitor.

Proof was allowed, and led. The import of the evidence is sufficiently given in the opinion of Lord Kincairney.

On 17th January 1905 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares, in terms of the first and second branches of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, and also in terms of the third branch of said conclusion in so far, but in so far only, as an alleged 'Duke of Albemarle' brooch, sold at the price of £85, is concerned: Finds, decerns, and declares, in terms of the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, that the defenders are bound to accept return tendered to them of the articles referred to in said first and second branches of said first declaratory conclusion, and in said third branch thereof as far as said alleged 'Duke of Albemarle' brooch is concerned, as aforesaid, and to make repayment of the sums paid by the pursuer to them in respect thereof, viz.—(1) the sum of £150 in respect of the alleged Flora Macdonald necklace and pendant; (2) the sum of £185 in respect of the alleged medallion of Her Majesty the late Queen Victoria; (3) the sum of £85 in respect of the alleged 'Duke of Albemarle' brooch, with interest on said sums as after mentioned, and accordingly decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the said sums of £150, £185, and £85, amounting together to the sum of £420 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation in this action till payment; and quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—On the evidence it was not proved that Landsberg made any representation regarding the articles. On that assumption the pursuer had no case. In a contract of sale where there was no representation or warranty the rule was caveat emptor. Silence was not equivalent to misrepresentation, even if the seller knew that the buyer was under a misapprehension.[1]

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—On the evidence it was proved that Landsberg represented to the pursuer that the articles were antique. At the lowest it was proved that he said he knew nothing about their history, and that, in the case of articles which had been made up to his own order, was a misrepresentation. Even if it were held that he said nothing, the articles involved a misrepresentation. The seller of sham antiques was bound to state that they were sham. The maxim res ipsa loquitur applied. If a man sold a sham coin at the price of a real one, he surely represented that the coin was genuine. Mere silence might be representation.[2]

At advising,—

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I have found this action confused, intricate, and difficult; but, after consideration, I have come to concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuer carries on business in George Street, Edinburgh, as a bookseller and printseller, and dealer in curios, and engravings; and the defenders design themselves as diamond merchants in London. The action relates to purchases from the defenders by the pursuer, made of course with the view of re-sale at a profit in the course of her business. The articles purchased purported to be (1) a necklace with a miniature of Flora Macdonald, (2) a medallion of Queen Victoria in coronation robes, (3) a brooch with a miniature of the Duke of Albemarle (General Monk), bearing the date 1650, and (4) an emerald brooch, the question about which has been decided by the Lord Ordinary for the defenders, and is not brought up by this reclaiming note. The questions debated have related therefore to the three articles first named,—The Flora Macdonald necklace and miniature, the medallion of the Queen, and the Albemarle brooch. These were purchased on 15th December 1902, 3d March 1903, and 3d July 1903, at the prices of £150, £250, and £150. This last sum of £150 includes the price of the emerald brooch which is not within the reclaiming note, and the parties seem to be agreed that £85 of that sum shall be held as paid for the Albemarle brooch. These prices have been paid by the pursuer except £50, being part of the price of the medallion of the Queen.

By this action the pursuer seeks repayment of the sums so paid by her. The action is in a somewhat unusual form, but is in substance a reduction of the sales.

The three articles to which the action now relates are of the same general character. They are all ornamental and artistic, set with gold enamel and various gems, chiefly diamonds and pearls, and each forms a single piece of bijouterie or object of vertu. It is averred, and I think it is proved, notwithstanding considerable differences in the evidence of the skilled witnesses, that the prices charged by the defenders and paid are exorbitant, a point to which I need not return; but it is not said that the jewels and gold with which they were ornamented are false, although it is said they are of poor quality and small value; still it is not said that they are essentially different (except in one important particular) from what they purported to be, and, apart from that particular, it is not suggested that there is any ground on which the sales can be set aside. That particular is, that whereas they were sold as antiques, apparently of value on account of their antiquity and associations, they are not really antiques or relics or rarities at all, but are modern fabrications, and have really no associations; perhaps not wholly without value as deceptive objects of art, but of no value as relics or antiques.

The first articles of the record are vague and general, and it is not until the sixth condescendence that the pursuer distinctly avers that the articles sold "are modern productions, made-up goods, and of inferior quality, that the respective prices obtained by the defenders from her therefor were unconscionable and out of all proportion to their true value. Of this the defenders were, at the time of the respective transactions aforesaid, well aware, while the pursuer was in ignorance thereof." The essence of the case seems to lie in this ill-framed averment, which I take to mean that the defenders, when they sold the articles, knew that they were "modern productions, made-up goods." The word "fraud" or "fraudulent" is not in the condescendence, although I think that falsehood with the knowledge that what was said was false is averred, and that, I take it, amounts to an averment of fraud.

The defences are equally unsatisfactory. They consist mainly of denials that the defenders made any averment about the articles or gave any warranty; and, although they were the sellers of the articles, and though Louis Landsberg brought them personally to the pursuer, the defenders assert that they said nothing to her about them but merely exhibited them, leaving her to form her own judgment; and, although there is no admission that they were represented to be antiques, the answers suggest that they might be so for anything the defenders knew to the contrary. Now, that was the nature of the record on which parties went to proof, and it is startling to find it now admitted that the defenders not only knew all about the articles sold, but made them themselves or had them made for them.

I find it impossible to avoid the conviction that the defenders intended to mislead, and did mislead the pursuer.

It may be true, however, that the case cannot, or at least need not be, decided against the defenders on the ground of their silence and non-disclosure only, nor on the ground of the apparent antiquity of the articles, nor because the pursuer believed them to be old, nor even that the defenders were aware that the pursuer was under that belief and did not undeceive her, because the defenders' contention in law that when a seller gives no warranty the buyer must protect himself must be conceded. But when a seller knows that a buyer is purchasing under a false impression, he certainly must take care not to go a step beyond what the law does not prevent. But the Lord Ordinary has not proceeded on mere misapprehension, but on active, direct, aggressive falsehood, which he finds proved against the defenders, and which forms the ground of his judgment.

No. 123.

Patterson v. Landsberg & Son.

The question, therefore, seems to be this question of fact, depending on conflicting evidence, whether, in any of the three cases, or in all of them, the transactions were induced by the active and positive misrepresentation of the defenders.

The first of the sales in date is that of the Flora Macdonald necklace and miniature. Was that transaction induced by the false statements of the defenders? The Lord Ordinary has decided that question against the defenders, and I agree, although not without hesitation. On this point, as throughout the action, the defenders give no assistance. They assert that they said nothing whatever, and merely stand on the ground that they gave no warranty and made no representation.

The question, therefore, is whether the defenders passed the limits sanctioned or overlooked by the law, and made some false averment of a material character which persuaded the pursuer to purchase this article. The pursuer depones that Mr Landsberg, when he called at her shop with the necklace and pendant, stated that "the necklace had been given by one of the Stuarts to Flora Macdonald in recognition of her devotion to the cause of the Stuarts." The pursuer's case is that she believed that statement, and in that belief, and because of it, bought the necklace and miniature. There seems no doubt that that was the pursuer's understanding, but how that understanding was reached is not explained. Mr Landsberg has no suggestion to make about the portrait from which the miniature was taken, but it may be readily believed that the pursuer would recognise the portrait. It is, however, next to impossible to suppose that having got this miniature painted by Mr Soper, the defender said nothing at all about it to the pursuer, whether he intended to tell the truth or to deceive, but merely laid it before her, leaving her to name the miniature for herself.

On the whole, I am not prepared to dissent from the Lord Ordinary's conclusion that Landsberg falsely represented to the pursuer that the portrait, necklace, and pendant formed a genuine Stuart relic, and induced her to buy it on account of that false belief.

The second article is the medallion of the Queen. It represents the Queen in coronation robes, but it was not of the date of the coronation. but was made up by the defenders, and the portrait was painted by Soper on the defenders' employment. Here, again, the proof of representation is incomplete and unsatisfactory. Landsberg says he made no representation of any kind. The pursuer depones that Landsberg asserted that it had been presented by the Queen on her coronation to a lady of rank, which, if said, was of course false. It does not appear that he named the lady, but it is difficult to understand how he could possibly have avoided some statement, true or false, about the portrait. The Lord Ordinary finds his positive falsehood in the assertion that he, Landsberg, knew nothing about the medallion and could give no history of it. That was positively false, seeing that he knew everything about its history from beginning to end.

The pursuer advertised this medallion in the Connoisseur, and she does not state in the advertisement that it represented the Queen at her coronation, which was what Landsberg, according to her, had told her. But she advertises it to the public as the work of Chalons, a miniature painter of the period, which seems to have been a gratuitous invention of her own, and which leads one to receive her evidence with considerable doubt. I believe, however, that Landsberg did represent that it was a work of the time of the coronation, and deceived the pursuer by that falsehood.

Some difficulty, however, is occasioned as to this part of the case by a second transaction between Landsberg and the pursuer about this medallion, which took place at or about 2d January 1904, at which date I do not think she was fully aware of the defenders' deception. But I consider that the arrangement then made was afterwards cancelled.

The only other point remaining regards the Duke of Albemarle's miniature.

Here also there is a narrow question whether the defenders' representations went so far as to entitle the pursuer to rescind the sale. The question resembles that raised about the medallion of the Queen. The miniature was made by Soper by the directions of the defenders. General Monk seems a somewhat singular person about whom to practise such a deception, and one would hardly have expected his name to raise a very large price. The defenders were no doubt very reserved, but Mr Landsberg did assert that he knew nothing about the miniature, which was the same untruth as that about the medallion of the Queen. Perhaps the erroneous date on the miniature may be noticed, as well as the other mistakes mentioned in his evidence. These, however, are not of importance now that the manufacture of the article has been admitted.

I think it proved that in these three transactions the defenders practised a system of deception, against which possibly the pursuer might have been unable to find a remedy, had not the defenders gone the length of positive misrepresentation.

Lord Kyllachy.—In this case I have since the hearing carefully read the proof, and the result is, I have come generally to the same conclusion as that which has just been expressed.

I confess to having some doubt as to whether the defender's representations were in all respects so explicit as might be inferred from the pursuer's evidence. I think it quite possible that the defender at all events believed that he had sufficiently guarded himself against what he calls guarantees (or as he probably means representations) as to the character and history of these articles. But on full consideration I have been unable to conclude otherwise than that, in one way or another, he (the defender), knowing the contrary, conveyed to the pursuer that the Flora Macdonald and the General Monk jewels were what are commonly called "antiques," and that if the Queen Victoria miniature was not an antique, it was at least a contemporary portrait having a history. That is the Lord Ordinary's view who saw the witnesses and took the proof, and I am unable to say that he had not sufficient grounds for that conclusion. It is probably true that with respect to the Flora Macdonald jewel the Lord Ordinary's reasoning partly proceeded upon a misapprehension as to the source of the pursuer's knowledge that the portrait was one of Flora Macdonald. The parties were agreed that that was so. But it does not seem to me that that is a matter which at all affects the substance of his Lordship's judgment.

Patterson v. Landsberg & Son.

It is not perhaps necessary to say more. But I may add that I am personally disposed to think that the case might be decided upon a ground which does not involve a solution of the conflict of testimony between the pursuer and the defender, and which would apply even if there were no adequate reason for preferring the testimony of the one to that of the other.

I must say I incline to hold upon the proof, and indeed upon the defender's own evidence, (1) that the appearance of age and other appearances presented by these articles constituted by themselves misrepresentations; in short, that the case is really one of res ipsa loquitur; (2) that this being so, the defender was not entitled to leave, as he says he did, the articles to speak for themselves, but was bound to displace the inferences which the appearance of the articles was to his knowledge bound to suggest; and (3) that the defender not only failed to do this, but by the use of equivocal language and assumption of airs of mystery and otherwise, indorsed and helped to encourage the inferences which the appearance of the articles suggested. I refer in particular to such things as (1) the attachment of the £350 ticket to the Victoria miniature, as to which the defender can give no explanation; (2) the statement as to the same miniature that he knew nothing about it, and could give no history; (3) the similar statement as to the Albemarle jewel; and (4) the conversation of a similar import as to the ribbon required (as shewn in old pictures) to be used in wearing the Flora Macdonald necklace.

It appears to me that it is difficult to say that the defender has discharged the onus which in these circumstances rests upon him, and I am disposed to think that in this view alone the pursuer is entitled to judgment.

1st Division. Sheriff of Forfarshire.

A CLAIM for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by John Adam against his employers, Cooper & Greig, engineers and boilermakers, Dundee, was submitted to the determination of the Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire (Campbell Smith) as arbitrator.

On 12th July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the interlocutor quoted below.*

The Sheriff-substitute having refused to state a case, Cooper & Greig presented a note to the First Division praying for an order on the claimant to shew cause why a case should not be stated. They averred that the claimant had been sent by them on the day of the accident, along with two other men, to repair a boiler at the factory of the Tayport Spinning Company at Tayport, while the work of that factory was suspended for the annual holidays. "The work to be done was the removal and renewal of the blow-off saddle of the boiler, and no steam, water, or other mechanical power was employed by the appellants in the performance thereof, or in connection therewith."

They further set forth the questions of law they desired to be submitted to the Court.

The claimant lodged answers, in which he maintained that the Sheriff was justified in refusing to state a case, as no question of law arose.

On 29th November 1904 the First Division remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to state a case setting forth the facts found by him to be admitted or proved relative to the following questions:—"(First) Whether the respondent was injured in or about a 'factory' within the meaning of section 7 (1), (2), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?* (Second) Whether the appellants were 'undertakers' of that 'factory' within the meaning of section 7 (2) of said Act? (Third) Whether the work at which the respondent was injured was 'engineering work' within the meaning of section 7 (2) of said Act? (Fourth) Whether, if the foregoing are answered in the affirmative, the Sheriff-substitute was right in awarding compensation for the period from 12th April to 18th December 1903, and recommend to the Sheriff-substitute to include in such case any other question of law arising out of the facts found by him to be admitted or proved relative to the merits of the claim, and to give his judgment on the facts relative to these points?"

The case stated by the Sheriff-substitute set forth that all questions of fact in controversy between the parties were disposed of by his interlocutor of 12th July 1904, which was referred to and held as repeated in the stated case. The case further stated as follows:—"The Sheriff-substitute wrote his interlocutor and note in the undoubting belief that the three questions set forth in the interlocutor of the Court of appeal all fell to be answered in the affirmative in point of fact. . . . At the time of the accident there was a contiguous and substitute boiler generating steam and driving the machinery in the adjoining mechanics' shop, and that machinery and steam-propelled tools were at the service of the defenders, had they required to use them to facilitate any part of their work. . . ."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia, "(1) Whether, in respect of the facts admitted and proved as above set forth, the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in law in holding the pursuer entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"

Argued for the appellants;—It was settled by authority that, under section 7 (1), (2), in order to give a claim under the Act, the factory in which the accident occurred must be the factory of the workman's employers. The employer was not an "undertaker" of a factory which was not in his occupation and under his control.[1] The appellants, therefore, not being "undertakers" of the spinning-mill, where the accident occurred, were not liable in compensation. (2) The work in which the respondent was engaged when he sustained the injury was not work in which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power was used, but was done entirely by hand. Therefore it was not an engineering work, as defined in section 7 (2) of the Act.

Argued for the respondent;—The spinning-mill was undoubtedly a factory, and the respondent was employed in that factory by the appellants. It was immaterial that the accident occurred outside of the premises actually belonging to the appellants. The spinning-mill was for the time being for all practical purposes part of the appellants' yard, and the respondent was at the time engaged "in the course of his employment," and this was sufficient under section 1 (1) of the Act to give him a claim for compensation. The appellants were "occupiers" of the spinning-mill on a lawful and sufficient title at the time of the accident, and were, therefore, "undertakers," in accordance with the definition in section 7 (2). (2) The work in which the respondent was engaged at the time of the accident was part of a composite process. Though mechanical power was not then in actual use, the duty he was performing was a necessary part of a composite process of repair, in the course of which mechanical power was used. In the spinning-mill there was, as stated in the case, steam power available for the use of the appellants' workmen, if and when required. The work, accordingly, was an "engineering work" in the sense of the Act, and the appellants were the undertakers thereof.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The stated case before your Lordships is not satisfactory in form, but still there are in it and the note for appellants and answers sufficient materials to enable your Lordships to dispose of the case. It is not in satisfactory form, because it would have been more convenient, in view of the interlocutor pronounced by your Lordships on 29th November 1904, if the Sheriff-substitute had kept to the questions then asked instead of substituting two new questions of his own. The reason for his doing so appears from the stated case, where he says,—"The Sheriff-substitute wrote his interlocutor and note in the undoubting belief that the three questions set forth in the interlocutor of the Court of appeal all fell to be answered in the affirmative in point of fact." When I turn to your Lordships' interlocutor I find it was a remit to state the facts relative to the following questions, viz.:—(1) Whether the respondent was injured in or about a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 (1), (2), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897? (2) Whether the appellants were "undertakers" of that "factory" within the meaning of section 7 (2) of said Act? (3) Whether the work at which the respondent was injured was "engineering work" within the meaning of section 7 (2) of said Act? These are not questions of fact; they may be questions of composite fact and law, and if so, they are questions of law. The Sheriff-substitute treats them as questions of fact, and states new questions for himself. But sufficient material is given in the findings in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, which is incorporated by him with the stated case—(His Lordship quoted the interlocutor).

Now, on these findings it is clear that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment proceeded on one of two grounds, either (1) that the place where the accident occurred was a "factory," and the appellants were "undertakers" thereof; or (2) that the place was an "engineering work."

(1) This point is entirely concluded by authority. It is clear from the case of Wrigley v. Whittaker[2] that the "factory" referred to in section 7 (1) means the "factory" that belongs to the undertakers. This disposes of the first point, as the Tayport factory was not the factory of the defenders. (2) This point is not directly dealt with by decision. It is that these Tayport premises—for now the word "factory" is of no importance—became for the nonce the "engineering work" of the defenders. The Sheriff-substitute says the defenders were "tenants at will of the premises." The phrase seems to me quite inapplicable. Any tradesman coming to do work in a house is, on that principle, a "tenant at will" of the house while engaged on the work. It does not seem to me that there is any ground for such an idea. The view of the statute is that the work should be the work of the "undertakers," and "engineering work" is defined in section 7 (2),—"In this Act . . . 'engineering work' means any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer, and includes any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." Here it is clear that neither steam, water, or other mechanical power was used. It is not to the point that there was steam on the premises that might have been used, and consequently the fact falls far short of the definition of "engineering work" in the statute. The case fails therefore in the second point also, so that there is here no ground of liability at all.

In my opinion the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and if this is done the second question need not be answered.

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the facts)—The question is whether, on these facts, the claimant is entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?

The claim was put upon two grounds—(1) It was said that when he was injured he was engaged on or in or about a factory. No doubt he was injured in a factory. But it has been held, and I think rightly, that in order to give a claim under the Act the factory must be the factory of the employer, and the factory in which this accident occurred was not the employer's factory. (2) It was said he was employed on or in or about an "engineering work." Now, when we go to the definition of "engineering work" in subsection (2) we find that it means "any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer." The work of the claimant here did not fall under any of these categories. We find also that "engineering work" includes "any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." If the workman is engaged on or about a railway or the other kinds of work mentioned in the earlier part of the definition, it is unnecessary that mechanical power should be employed. But in the case of the work mentioned in the later part of the definition, it is essential that machinery driven by mechanical power is used. In the work at which the claimant was engaged at the time of the accident no mechanical power was used. The work was all done by hand. That is the distinction between the present case and the case of Reid v. P. R. Fleming & Company.[1] In that case mechanical power was used, and that fact made the employers liable. But in this case the work was not an engineering work in the sense of the Act.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative.

Administration of Justice—Lord Ordinary on the Bills—Declinature—Court of Session Act, 1821 (1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 38), sec. 4.—In a note of suspension and interdict at the instance of the Free Church of Scotland against the Rev. John M'Rae, United Free Church, Aberfeldy, and others, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Johnston) orally reported to the First Division that the case was one connected with a series of litigations in which he had acted throughout as counsel for the Free Church of Scotland and for the local parties connected with it, and that in these circumstances he thought it proper to decline, but in respect it was a Bill-Chamber case, he could not do so without their Lordships' assistance under the statute.† The Court in respect of this report sustained the declinature, and remitted the case to another Lord Ordinary.

Contract—Consensus in idem—Sale or Hire—Hire Purchase Agreements—Construction of verbal contract.—A, a piano merchant, who was in the practice of disposing of his pianos in one of three ways—1st, in sales for cash; 2, in hire-purchase agreements; 3, in letting them for hire—made an oral offer to B of a piano "at the value of £26, payable 15s. per month." B accepted the offer, and after the lapse of a month paid certain instalments. B having subsequently failed to continue the payments, A raised an action in the Sheriff Court for re-delivery of the piano, alleging that it had been let on hire to B. It appeared from a proof that A in making his offer had intended the transaction to be on the hire-purchase system, while B understood it to be a sale for a price payable by instalments. The Sheriff held that as there had been no consensus in idem, there was no valid contract between the parties, and that A was entitled to have the piano restored.

In an appeal, held that B understood, and was entitled to understand from the terms of A's offer, that the transaction was an immediate sale for a price payable by instalments, and that a contract of sale had been completed by B's acceptance.

the pursuers to the defender on or about 26th November 1902, and now in the possession of the defender."

The pursuers averred that they, on 26th November 1902, "agreed to hire" the piano to the defender "at a rent or hire of 15s. per month, a month's trial or approval being allowed; that the rent or hire of the piano for four months was paid by the defender on certain dates, the fourth month's rent being paid on 27th April 1903, since which date the defender has made no payments towards the said rent, with the exception of 3s. paid upon 18th January 1904; and that the defender had been repeatedly requested either to pay up the arrears of rent or deliver the piano to the pursuers, but declined to do either the one or the other."

The defender denied these averments, and in a statement of facts stated that he purchased the piano from the pursuers for the price of £26. "No written contract was entered into between the parties, nor was one then suggested by the pursuers, but it was arranged that payment of the price was to be made by instalments extending over a period of years, the purchaser to pay as often and by as large sums as he possibly could, 15s. per month being talked about as a sum that would be acceptable. The piano was duly delivered by the pursuers and accepted by the defender on that understanding." These statements were denied by the pursuers.

The defender further stated, and the pursuers admitted, that on 15th December 1903 representatives of the pursuers called on defender's wife and endeavoured to get her to sign a hire contract, which she refused to do, and that on 18th January 1904 representatives of the pursuers called at the house of the defender to get him to sign a hire contract, but the defender refused.

The pursuers averred that the signature of the pursuers' usual hire agreement was contemplated by both parties from the beginning. This was denied by the defender.*

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The piano in question being the property of the pursuers, and having been hired to the defender, and he having fallen into arrears with the rent, they are entitled to delivery thereof from him.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (3) The pursuers having sold, and the defender having purchased and obtained delivery of the piano in question, and the property therein having passed to the defender, the present action is incompetent.

A proof was taken.†

* The form of agreement used by the pursuers in their business, No. 11 of process, is quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

† The material portions of the evidence were as follows:—George Grant, the pursuers' manager, examined—"I called on the defender. There were present defender, his wife, and myself. We sell pianos for cash, the full sum being paid in cash, and we sell on the hire-purchase system and also let out on hire. I offered the defender an instrument at the value of £26, payable 15s. per month." Cross-examined.—"I cannot say that I made it clear to defender that it was a trial hire."

The defender examined,—"After discussing terms, I agreed to purchase the piano in dispute at the price of £26. I told him I was unable in the meantime to pay the full value, and that he would require to take it by the instalment principle. He said that was all right. No mention was made of hire contract or hire-purchase system. Two or three days afterwards a piano was sent out. I was to pay the piano up at the rate of 15s. per

June 1, 1905. Muirhead & Turnbull v. Dickson.

On 15th July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers sold to the defender . . . a piano at the price of £26, payable by instalments of 15s. per month; that the defender has failed to pay the instalments as arranged . . . that the pursuers in these circumstances have no claim for delivery of the piano, their proper remedy being an action for the price; therefore assoilzies the defender."*

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, on 17th October 1904, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that about 25th November 1902 the defender obtained possession of a pianoforte belonging to the pursuers, pianoforte dealers, upon the understanding that it was to be paid for on the instalment system; the price of the piano being fixed at £26, and the instalments at 15s. per month: Finds that the pursuers, as the defender knew, carry on an extensive trade in pianofortes upon the hire-purchase system, their customers signing a contract providing, inter alia, that instalments shall be paid, and that the property in the piano shall not pass to the customer until the whole fixed price is paid, and that the pursuers shall be entitled to resume possession on failure duly to pay the instalments: Finds that the defender has failed to pay a number of instalments admittedly due, having paid in all only £3, 5s.: Finds that, on being required on account of his failure to pay to deliver up the pianoforte, the defender claimed that he had bought it, said that he would pay the balance of the price, and refused to sign a hire-purchase contract: Finds that the pursuers all along regarded the piano as having been delivered to the defender on a hire-purchase contract: Finds that it was agreed that the piano should be for a month on approbation, so that a hire-purchase contract was not at first executed, and that by an oversight on the part of their manager or other official there was delay for some months in sending a formal hire-purchase contract to month, and if I could see my way to pay sums over and above that, I was to do so. I have had a legal training. I am aware of the hire-purchase system."

Mrs Dickson, the defender's wife, examined,—"I remember in the month of November 1902 a representative of pursuers calling at my house with the view of selling a piano. He said we would get the piano by paying 15s. every month. . . . My husband and I were present on that occasion. Nothing was said about a hire contract. The piano was delivered on these terms."

* "NOTE.—The pursuers aver what is known as a hire-purchase agreement; the defender a sale, the price payable by instalments. The first-named of these bargains differs essentially from the second. A sale with deferred payment of the price is a sale pure and simple; the bargain about the price is merely a subsidiary one. A hire-purchase transaction is a sale with special conditions; one being suspensive, to the effect that in a certain event the sale is to be held as void. It appears to me that it rests with the person who wishes to establish that special form of contract, to do so by clear evidence; there is a presumption in favour of a simple sale. Here there is the evidence of Mr Grant on the one side, and of the defender and his wife on the other. It may be argued that the pursuers could not, in the nature of things, be expected to have any other evidence. But there is a piece of very valuable evidence which they might have had, and which it is their custom in similar transactions to procure, I mean a signed contract of hire purchase, for which they have printed forms. I cannot but feel that the absence of such a contract increases the presumption against them. . . ."

the defender for signature: Finds that in these circumstances it is not proved either that there was a sale or a hire-purchase contract, there being no mutual agreement to transfer the property, and possession having been given by the pursuers upon a supposed hire-purchase contract to the terms of which the defender did not agree: Finds therefore that the defender has no title of possession: Recalls the interlocutor of 15th July 1904, and ordains him to deliver as craved, and decerns: Finds that the pursuers are entitled to retain the sum paid as aforesaid, on account of the use the defender has had of the pianoforte, reserving any further claims: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses, including those of the appeal." *

The defender appealed, and argued;—The contract was not one of hiring, but a sale with deferred payments. The periodical payments stipulated for were instalments of the price. The amount of these payments was out of proportion to any payments that could reasonably have been stipulated for merely as hire for a piano of this value. The contention of the pursuers that the contract was one of hire purchase was wholly inconsistent with their own averments and the conclusion of their action. The evidence of the pursuers' manager was that he offered the defender this piano at a certain sum, and that the defender accepted the offer. The hire-purchase form of agreement was not produced by the pursuers at the date of the contract, and when, long afterwards, they tendered it to the defender for signature he consistently and properly refused to sign it. If the pursuers had intended the contract to be one of hire purchase, they should have made that clear to the defender at the time, and, on their own admission, they had not made it clear to him. The defender having bought the piano and being willing, in accordance with the contract, to pay the instalments of the price as soon as he could, the action should be dismissed. The principle of no consensus ad idem, which was the ground of the Sheriff's judgment, was quite inapplicable in the circumstances.

Argued for the pursuers;—The contract here was the very common form of contract known as hire purchase. Such a contract was truly a hire and not a sale, and, accordingly, the action was in proper form. The pursuers' case was established by the admission of the defender that he got the piano on the "instalment principle," and that he was aware of the hire-purchase system. To take a piano on "the instalment principle" meant taking it on the hire-purchase system. The

* "NOTE.— . . . Sheriff Davidson in his judgment deals with the case as it stands upon a strict view of the pleadings. But even so, I doubt, with all respect, whether the sound view of the situation is not the reverse of what he has held, viz., that in truth both parties made the hire-purchase agreement referred to in the receipts which passed between the parties. There can be little doubt that the price was fixed by the pursuers on the footing that they were making one of their usual contracts, and that it would have been higher if the very easy terms of sale contended for by the defender had been agreed to. But there is not the usual formal agreement, and, as I have indicated, the defender may have honestly thought that he was buying outright. I think that the absence of a plea in law, which can always be supplied, is not a reason why it should not be held, as it seems right and reasonable to hold, that when the instrument was delivered and approved there was no consensus in idem. In other words, there was mutual mistake in regard to the nature of the contract, so that there was no valid contract at all, and the true owner is entitled to restitution.—(Erskine iii. 1, 10; Bell's Prin. 11 (5), 526-531 sqq.)" hire-purchase system had been recognised by the Courts both in Scotland and England, and under such a contract the property in the piano had not passed to the defender, and the pursuers were entitled to delivery of it.[1] It was quite unknown in the pursuers' business to sell instruments on the footing that the price was to be paid by instalments and the property in the instrument pass at once to the purchaser, and this was well known to the defender. The fact that the hire-purchase agreement was not signed by the defender did not make the contract any the less a hire purchase, for the form of hire-purchase agreement could have been signed by the defender at any subsequent time, and the pursuers had relied on his signing it. If the contract was not one of hire purchase, there had not been consensus ad idem between the parties, and, therefore, there had not been a contract at all.[2] In this view the Sheriff was right in holding that the pursuers, as the true owners of the piano, were entitled to delivery of it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from the Sheriff of Lanarkshire in which the pursuers who are piano merchants, sue the defender, who is resident in Glasgow, and pray for an order upon the defender to deliver to the pursuers a certain piano hired by the pursuers to the defender on or about 26th November 1902, and now in his possession. The case is not, I think, either free from difficulty or satisfactory for your Lordships' determination. I find considerable difficulty in understanding the pleadings as they are, and still more in arriving at the meaning of the precise form of questions which have been put to the witnesses. The action is laid with the prayer which I have quoted, and sets forth in the condescendence a mere agreement to hire a piano at the rate of 15s. per month. Then follows the statement that whereas for a certain time the 15s. were paid further payments were not duly made, and that those payments not having been made the pursuers are entitled to redelivery of the piano. The defence proponed to this demand is that the piano is the property of the defender in virtue of a contract of sale entered into on the said 26th of November and verbally concluded between Mr Grant, one of the partners of the pursuers' firm, and the defender, by which contract the piano was sold to the defender for £26, payment being conditioned to be made by instalments. The averment as to the instalments is certainly in a peculiar form, because it is said that the piano was to be paid by instalments extending over a period of years, the purchaser to pay as often and by as large sums as he possibly could—15s. per month being talked about as a sum that would be acceptable. The learned Sheriff-substitute, before whom the case depended, assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action, pronouncing a finding that the pursuers sold to the defender, on the date specified in the petition, a piano at the price of £26, payable by instalments at the rate of 15s. per month, his view being that, that sale having been truly effected, the pursuers had mistaken their remedy, their true remedy being, not of course to sue for re-delivery of the piano, which was not theirs, but to sue for the instalments remaining unpaid. The Sheriff, on appeal, recalled that interlocutor, and pronounced a set of detailed findings, all of which I need not read, but the crucial one of which I think is this:—"Finds that in these circumstances it is not proved either that there was a sale or a hire-purchase contract, there being no mutual agreement to transfer the property, and possession having been given by the pursuers upon a supposed hire-purchase contract to the terms of which the defender did not agree: Finds therefore that the defender has no title of possession." In other words, the view to which the Sheriff came was that although the defender had not proved the contract which the Sheriff-substitute held proved, the pursuers on their part had not proved that upon 26th November they had made out a hire-purchase contract, so that in law there was no consensus in idem —no contract at all—and that consequently the only title to the piano being in the original proprietors of the instrument, the pursuers, they were entitled to delivery.

Now, your Lordships will notice that in detailing the Sheriff's judgment I have used the words as he used them, "hire-purchase contract," and the whole endeavour of the pursuers in the proof was to make out that the true bargain upon 26th November was a hire-purchase bargain. A hire-purchase bargain is not perhaps a term actually known to the law as a term of art, but it is a form of contract which has become common enough in modern times, and it was judicially inquired into and noticed in the case of Helby v. Mathews.[1] It is a form of bargain by which the sellers of these instruments who wish to push their sales have tried to get round the doctrine of common law, uncomfortable to them, that you cannot give a person a moveable, and at the same time hold that moveable in security of the debt which that other person may owe, or in security of the contract in respect of which the moveable is transferred. I am not by any means suggesting that the proceeding is not a perfectly proper one. It was held to be quite legal in the case before the House of Lords, and although perhaps there might be something said upon whether the old view of the common law was not one which was more conducive to advantageous dealing between citizens, I do not think these considerations are for a Court of law so long as the form of contract is a perfectly legal form. The particular class of bargain which these pursuers admittedly wished to enter into on that date is shewn by the form No. 11 of process, which is the hire-purchase form in ordinary use by the pursuers' firm, and which was the form which after that date they made several efforts to induce either the defender or the defender's wife to sign, which they refused to do. I ask your Lordships' attention to this for the reason that here we have the first peculiarity of the case as regards the position of the pleadings to which I alluded in my opening remarks. The form No. 11 of process is a form of agreement by which the person signing it agrees to hire from Muirhead & Turnbull such and such a piano, of the value of so much, to pay to them the sum of so much "on signing this agreement (in consideration of the option of purchase herein given) and for which credit will only be given in the event of the purchase being effected as herein provided; and for the use thereof the sum of per month, the first payment to be made upon ." Then there are certain stipulations for taking care of the piano and allowing persons to inspect it and so on, and a provision that the one party is to return the piano if he allows one monthly payment to run into arrears. He is also bound to pay its full value if it should be damaged or destroyed, and then it goes on,—"Declaring, that at any time during the hiring (subject to the conditions aforesaid) the said Muirhead & Turnbull shall be bound on demand to sell said pianoforte to me at the price of £26 sterling, in which case I shall receive credit for all payments previously made under this agreement. I shall be at liberty to return the said instrument after I have paid hire for a period of three months, and in that case I shall only be liable for hire up to date of return, but not for less than three months' hire in any case. Notwithstanding of anything herein contained, I shall have no right of property in said pianoforte until after a sale in terms of the foregoing obligation, and this is declared to be a suspensive condition."

I call your Lordships' attention to that because I think your Lordships will see that it truly does not square with the pursuers' condescendence at all. The pursuers' condescendence simply narrrates a naked agreement of hire, and when we called the attention of Mr Lees to that fact his answer was that the hire-purchase agreement of his clients was truly a hire and not a sale. That it is a hire I have no doubt, but it is a hire and something more. It is a bilateral contract which gives the person the option to convert the hire into a sale. The great difference which seems to me to lie between that agreement and an ordinary naked hiring arrangement, which had no term in it to shew that it was a bargain of hire for a certain time—what would in the case of other subjects have been a lease—is that the latter could at any moment have been put an end to. If, for example, you hired a piano at will, you could at any moment put an end to that contract, whereas it is perfectly clear that, under an agreement such as I have read, the person who gets the piano, although it is still truly a hiring agreement, has his creditor under an obligation that if he does certain things the transaction will be turned into a sale, and if he chooses to pay the balance he becomes proprietor. That is truly in its essence a perfectly different agreement from the agreement which we should gather from reading the condescendence. So much for the pleadings of the pursuers. The pleadings of the defender are really not much better, because though he says that there was a sale, and a sale with a superadded condition that the price should not be paid at once in cash, but should be paid in instalments, when he goes on to say what the instalments are, he sets forth in the paragraph I have read what I do not say is impossible, but what is so unlikely that it is difficult to believe a piano merchant would ever enter into such a bargain. In cases which are begun in the inferior Courts—however much your Lordships may deplore the irregular pleadings—this Court has never been in use to deprive litigants of justice because their procurators have written their pleadings badly, and accordingly I do not think your Lordships should dispose of this case upon the pleadings either of the one side or the other. To dispose of it on the strict view of pleadings would result in turning the case out of Court altogether, finding neither party entitled to expenses, and pronouncing no operative order. But I do not think your Lordships can do that, and therefore I propose to examine what is the position of affairs as it would have been if the pleadings had been rectified.

There is one thing which is not a matter of pleading. Your Lordships cannot change the actual form of the action. The action is one for delivery and nothing else. We cannot turn it into a petitory action for money. Now, it is certain that the piano is in the place where it is, that is to say in the custody of the defender, in consequence of an arrangement come to between the pursuers and the defender. The defender did not get hold of the piano by any trick or subterfuge. He did not borrow it or steal it, or get it by some false pretence. The pursuers are coming here to invert the present possession. I make that observation because I think something might turn upon the onus. We have therefore to inquire and come to the best conclusion we can as to what was the bargain made between these two people. Now, the description of the bargain is given by three witnesses. It is given by the pursuers or the person who is the manager of the pursuing firm, and it is given by the defender and by the defender's wife. The crucial part of it is contained in a very few sentences, and here I find the justification for the other observation I made as to the way in which the witnesses have been examined. The one thing that is not asked either on the one side or the other is what the people said; and yet of course it is on what the people said that the whole question depends. But your Lordships must take the evidence and see what it comes to. Mr Grant, the pursuers' manager, says that there were present at the interview the defender, his wife, and himself, and then he goes on—turning his evidence into oratio directa—as follows:—"We sell pianos for cash, the full sum being paid in cash, and we sell on the hire-purchase system, and also let out on hire. I offered defender an instrument at the value of £26, payable 15s. per month." Now, I agree that, if that evidence is taken fairly to Mr Grant, it means that he had in his mind to let out this instrument upon his own hire-purchase system. Your Lordships see that he details three methods in which he conducts his business:—Selling pianos for cash, the whole sum being paid down; hire purchase; and mere hire.

Now, the offer which he details is an offer of the piano for £26, payable 15s. per month. This cannot be the first of his methods of business, because it is not a sum in cash; and it cannot be the third, because it is not a mere hire, and therefore it is the middle kind according to his views.

At the same time Mr Grant—and I think it right, in fairness to Mr Grant, to say that I see no reason to suppose that he was anything but perfectly honest and upright in the evidence he has given—says in cross-examination, —"I cannot say that I made it clear to defender that it was a trial hire." Now, the defender says that Grant called and stated he would "be pleased to let me have a piano. I left it with himself, because I was no judge. After discussing terms I agreed to purchase the piano in dispute at the price of £26. I told him I was unable in the meantime to pay the full value, and that he would require to take it by the instalment principle. He said that was all right." The defender's wife's view is substantially the same.

June 1, 1905. Muirhead & Turnbull v. Dickson.

She says, "He, Grant, said he would get the piano by paying 15s. every month, and if it was paid in three years there would be a good discount. My husband and I were present on that occasion. Nothing was said about a hire contract." Now, of course, if the matter really was as to what in their inmost hearts people thought, I think that, taking these people as honest people on both one side and the other, what they thought would lead me to the conclusion at which the Sheriff has arrived, namely, that Grant thought he was selling on the hire-purchase system, and the other person thought he was buying upon some instalment plan. But commercial contracts cannot be arranged by what people think in their inmost minds. Commercial contracts are made according to what people say, and accordingly I come to the conclusion that what was said here was, in the words of Mr Grant himself, that he offered the defender an instrument of the value of £26, payable 15s. per month, and that the defender accepted that offer, namely, to buy a piano at £26, but payable on the instalment principle at the rate of 15s. a month. In other words, I think the finding of the Sheriff-substitute which I read is a true finding in fact, because I think that was the meaning of Grant's words which the defender was entitled to accept according to their ordinary meaning. Grant could have made it clear if he had liked that his meaning was not the ordinary meaning of these words, but that their meaning was that he really wanted a hire-purchase agreement by producing the hire-purchase agreement on the spot. But he admits himself that he did nothing of the sort, and that as matter of fact the hire-purchase agreement was never put before the defender till long after, when certain of the instalments had been paid. Mr Lees made an attempt to shew that really the defender proved the pursuers' case by saying that he used the words that he would require to get it on the instalment principle, and Mr Lees argued that the instalment principle really meant the hire-purchase system. I do not think it is possible to arrive at that result. In the first place, if a man says "I will take a thing on the instalment principle," I do not think that in ordinary language he does anything more than say "I will take it by paying up instalments." When you have a word like instalment principle you can only give it a meaning by one of two methods. It has either the ordinary meaning of the English language, or you can shew by appropriate evidence that instalment principle means a certain sort of arrangement. I think you can only do that by shewing that a certain custom is so well known that it has become part of the general law merchant—and nobody suggests that that is the case here—or you can shew that a particular custom has been so generally accepted in a particular trade that it has become an implied part of every bargain made in ordinary course of that trade. But in order to do that you must have appropriate averments and appropriate proof. Mr Lees said that everybody in Glasgow knew about it. But I should say that the knowledge of it in Glasgow is of a fluctuating character, and there is no better illustration of that than by comparing the agreement in the case quoted to us, Murdoch & Company v. Greig,[1] with the agreement in the present case. They both represent the laudable efforts of instrument makers to sell their instruments and at the same time get security for their debts. But, as your Lordships will remember, Lord President Inglis held in the case of Murdoch [1] that it was a sale out and out, but a sale under suspensive conditions, whereas I agree with Mr Lees that the agreement sought to be brought forward in this case is an agreement which will square with the agreement in Helby's [2] case, with the option of a sale if certain conditions were fulfilled. All that accentuates the fact that by merely using the words instalment principle you cannot bring in the very peculiar and very particular stipulations of the agreement I have read to your Lordships.

That is my view of the case, and the result is that in this case the petition falls to be dismissed. I do not mean to say that in some ways it is a very satisfactory result, but I do not think the Court ever does much good by speculating upon the particular moral results of a judgment between two parties. The plain lesson to be derived I hope from the judgment is this, that when parties wish to bind persons to a contract with unusual stipulations they must bring that contract clearly to their knowledge, and that, on the other hand, if they use words which are capable of ordinary interpretation, they must expect the persons who hear them to take them up in their ordinary significance.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the pursuer's right to have his piano returned, which was the object of the action in the Sheriff Court, three different views have been taken. There is the view of the Sheriff Court petition, viz., that the piano was given to the defender on a contract of hiring, because neither in the prayer nor in the condescendence is there any reference made to the hire-purchase system, or any indication given that this alleged contract of hiring might in certain circumstances or conditions be converted into a contract of sale. The second view is the view which the pursuer supports by his evidence, and the theory he puts forward—I do not say the legal effect of his evidence—but the theory he advances in his evidence, is that the piano was delivered on what he calls a hire-purchase contract, and in explanation of what is meant by that the form No. 11 of process is tabled. The general effect of that form (in cases where it is the basis of the contract) is that the piano is let on hire at so much a month with the condition that the contract is converted into one of purchase by paying up the agreed-on price less the amount of the instalments already paid. Then the third view of the pursuer's claim is that taken by the Sheriff, which is that no contract was ever entered into, because the parties were not agreed as to the terms upon which the piano was given over, and consequently, that the piano being the pursuer's property but in the custody of the defender, must be delivered. The defender again has only one contention, and perhaps it is an advantage to him that he is consistent throughout. He says that the piano was sold to him on credit, and that while he has not been able to pay the price, this does not give the vendor any right to have the instrument returned. That is an intelligible contention, and if consistent with the facts, is, I think, sound in law. With regard to the Sheriff's ground of decision I am unable to agree with it, and for this reason. The ordinary case, what we may call the typical case of parties being remitted to their original rights in consequence of no effective contract being entered into is the case of ambiguity. Buchanan v. Duke of Hamilton,[1] a case in the House of Lords between landlord and tenant, is an instance of that kind. There were two offers. One party honestly believed that possession was given upon the faith of the two offers taken together, while the other party contended that it was only the second offer which was meant to be effective, and that the first had been impliedly withdrawn. The ambiguity did not arise upon the words of either instrument, but upon the time and manner in which the two offers were made. The much more common case is where the words of a contract are ambiguous, and it is impossible for the Court to say that each party is not honestly entitled to put his own meaning upon it. But I see no ambiguity in this case. There is here really nothing but a question of evidence. What are we to spell out of statements not entirely consistent regarding the terms upon which the piano was delivered? Now, the pursuer's statement is different from that put forward in the record. But I agree with your Lordship that the pursuer's statement as noted in the evidence is capable, in the absence of any specification of the words used, of being read with the defender's statement, which is that this was a sale on credit, the price being payable in instalments. It is true that the pursuer states that he has three modes of doing business, but there is nothing to shew that his customers had such a knowledge of his business that they knew all the different methods in which he was prepared to deal. There is no reason to suppose that in this case the defender knew anything more about the pursuer's conduct of business than what he was told at the time. The pursuer's statement is that he offered the piano on a month's trial, the instrument being of the value of £26 payable by monthly instalments of 15s. each. It may be that the pursuer had in his mind that this was to be a hire-purchase contract, but he does not say that he told the defender that there was to be an option. On the other hand, and here I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking this an important point, he never put into the defender's hands one of the printed forms applicable to the hire-purchase system. Against that you have the statement of the defender and his wife that they said they were unable to pay the piano at once, and that it would have to be on the instalment principle. I agree with your Lordship that that means a sale upon credit. The result of the evidence, which is not quite consistent, but as it seems to me not absolutely contradictory, is that there is nothing proved but a contract of sale with deferred payment, and I think the result which I should arrive at upon the parole evidence is confirmed by the proceedings which the pursuer thought it necessary to take, because evidently he was not very sure of his rights, and he ineffectually attempted to get the defender to sign a hire-purchase form.

The result is that I think we must return to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and while one feels that the result is not altogether an equitable one, because the defender meantime retains the piano while he does not seem to be in a position immediately to pay for it, yet that result I think is due entirely to the pursuer's loose mode of doing business in that he did not take care to confine his purchaser to the contract which he says he intended to make.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have found this a question of very great difficulty on the facts, but once the facts are ascertained there is not much difficulty in applying the law to them. But as to the facts themselves I have had very great doubts, arising mainly from the circumstance pointed out by the Lord President in his opinion that the evidence before us is taken in such a way as to leave material points not only unexplained but unexpressed. The appropriate and perfectly simple method of proving a verbal contract by parole is to put the parties into the witness-box and make them depone to the words of agreement that passed between them when the bargain was made. Nothing can be simpler than to prove a contract of sale or contract of hiring by proving the verbal offer and acceptance in the terms which were used by the people making the bargain at the time. Unfortunately neither party has thought it necessary to prove either what was said by themselves or by the other party to the contract, and therefore we are left to gather as best we can the intention of the contracting parties from indirect expressions as to the conclusion at which each had arrived in his own mind, because we are not informed what they said to one another when they were making their bargain. But then I agree with your Lordship that after proof has been led and closed, and the Judges in the Sheriff Court have applied their minds to it, it would be out of the question to throw out the case either because of defects in the pleadings, which are unfortunately very observable in the present case, or because of defects in the conduct of the case. We must take it as it stands and make the best of it, and although my difficulty has been very considerable I have come to the same conclusion and for the same reason as the Lord President has expressed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff . . . Find that the pursuers sold to the defender on the date specified a piano at the price of £26: That the pursuers in these circumstances have no claim for delivery of the piano, their proper remedy being an action for the instalments of the price so far as not paid: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern," &c.

On 15th July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers sold to the defender . . . a piano at the price of £26, payable by instalments of 15s. per month; that the defender has failed to pay the instalments as arranged . . . that the pursuers in these circumstances have no claim for delivery of the piano, their proper remedy being an action for the price; therefore assoilzies the defender."*

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, on 17th October 1904, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that about 25th November 1902 the defender obtained possession of a pianoforte belonging to the pursuers, pianoforte dealers, upon the understanding that it was to be paid for on the instalment system; the price of the piano being fixed at £26, and the instalments at 15s. per month: Finds that the pursuers, as the defender knew, carry on an extensive trade in pianofortes upon the hire-purchase system, their customers signing a contract providing, inter alia, that instalments shall be paid, and that the property in the piano shall not pass to the customer until the whole fixed price is paid, and that the pursuers shall be entitled to resume possession on failure duly to pay the instalments: Finds that the defender has failed to pay a number of instalments admittedly due, having paid in all only £3, 5s.: Finds that, on being required on account of his failure to pay to deliver up the pianoforte, the defender claimed that he had bought it, said that he would pay the balance of the price, and refused to sign a hire-purchase contract: Finds that the pursuers all along regarded the piano as having been delivered to the defender on a hire-purchase contract: Finds that it was agreed that the piano should be for a month on approbation, so that a hire-purchase contract was not at first executed, and that by an oversight on the part of their manager or other official there was delay for some months in sending a formal hire-purchase contract to month, and if I could see my way to pay sums over and above that, I was to do so. I have had a legal training. I am aware of the hire-purchase system."

Mrs Dickson, the defender's wife, examined,—"I remember in the month of November 1902 a representative of pursuers calling at my house with the view of selling a piano. He said we would get the piano by paying 15s. every month. . . . My husband and I were present on that occasion. Nothing was said about a hire contract. The piano was delivered on these terms."

* "NOTE.—The pursuers aver what is known as a hire-purchase agreement; the defender a sale, the price payable by instalments. The first-named of these bargains differs essentially from the second. A sale with deferred payment of the price is a sale pure and simple; the bargain about the price is merely a subsidiary one. A hire-purchase transaction is a sale with special conditions; one being suspensive, to the effect that in a certain event the sale is to be held as void. It appears to me that it rests with the person who wishes to establish that special form of contract, to do so by clear evidence; there is a presumption in favour of a simple sale. Here there is the evidence of Mr Grant on the one side, and of the defender and his wife on the other. It may be argued that the pursuers could not, in the nature of things, be expected to have any other evidence. But there is a piece of very valuable evidence which they might have had, and which it is their custom in similar transactions to procure, I mean a signed contract of hire purchase, for which they have printed forms. I cannot but feel that the absence of such a contract increases the presumption against them. . . ."

the defender for signature: Finds that in these circumstances it is not proved either that there was a sale or a hire-purchase contract, there being no mutual agreement to transfer the property, and possession having been given by the pursuers upon a supposed hire-purchase contract to the terms of which the defender did not agree: Finds therefore that the defender has no title of possession: Recalls the interlocutor of 15th July 1904, and ordains him to deliver as craved, and decerns: Finds that the pursuers are entitled to retain the sum paid as aforesaid, on account of the use the defender has had of the pianoforte, reserving any further claims: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses, including those of the appeal." *

The defender appealed, and argued;—The contract was not one of hiring, but a sale with deferred payments. The periodical payments stipulated for were instalments of the price. The amount of these payments was out of proportion to any payments that could reasonably have been stipulated for merely as hire for a piano of this value. The contention of the pursuers that the contract was one of hire purchase was wholly inconsistent with their own averments and the conclusion of their action. The evidence of the pursuers' manager was that he offered the defender this piano at a certain sum, and that the defender accepted the offer. The hire-purchase form of agreement was not produced by the pursuers at the date of the contract, and when, long afterwards, they tendered it to the defender for signature he consistently and properly refused to sign it. If the pursuers had intended the contract to be one of hire purchase, they should have made that clear to the defender at the time, and, on their own admission, they had not made it clear to him. The defender having bought the piano and being willing, in accordance with the contract, to pay the instalments of the price as soon as he could, the action should be dismissed. The principle of no consensus ad idem, which was the ground of the Sheriff's judgment, was quite inapplicable in the circumstances.

Argued for the pursuers;—The contract here was the very common form of contract known as hire purchase. Such a contract was truly a hire and not a sale, and, accordingly, the action was in proper form. The pursuers' case was established by the admission of the defender that he got the piano on the "instalment principle," and that he was aware of the hire-purchase system. To take a piano on "the instalment principle" meant taking it on the hire-purchase system. The

* "NOTE.— . . . Sheriff Davidson in his judgment deals with the case as it stands upon a strict view of the pleadings. But even so, I doubt, with all respect, whether the sound view of the situation is not the reverse of what he has held, viz., that in truth both parties made the hire-purchase agreement referred to in the receipts which passed between the parties. There can be little doubt that the price was fixed by the pursuers on the footing that they were making one of their usual contracts, and that it would have been higher if the very easy terms of sale contended for by the defender had been agreed to. But there is not the usual formal agreement, and, as I have indicated, the defender may have honestly thought that he was buying outright. I think that the absence of a plea in law, which can always be supplied, is not a reason why it should not be held, as it seems right and reasonable to hold, that when the instrument was delivered and approved there was no consensus in idem. In other words, there was mutual mistake in regard to the nature of the contract, so that there was no valid contract at all, and the true owner is entitled to restitution.—(Erskine iii. 1, 10; Bell's Prin. 11 (5), 526-531 sqq.)" could see the hatchway"—there is an obvious mistake there, it must either be "after the man" or "they could see the hatchway"—"but when he first descended from daylight he could not see it."

I agree. I think that that is the result of the evidence. I think that it is quite clear that this is a place in which there was some light, doubtless a dim and uncertain light; but it was a place on the deck of the ship, and that ship at that time was undergoing thorough repair. Operations were being conducted all over it. Therefore, it seems to me, it was within the view of anybody who had any knowledge of such places that hatches would be liable to be left open, just as this hatch had been left open, for what was, after all, a very necessary purpose—of allowing access to the deck below. This is not the case of a man unaccustomed to such a place, and I do not think that it is of any advantage to make general observations as to what particular circumstances might create liability to an outsider. What we are dealing with here, was the case of a man accustomed to this class of job, going to his job on to a ship which, he knew, was in the hands of the repairer. He goes down into a place dimly lighted, a place where, as the learned Sheriff-substitute finds, he could have seen well enough if he had only waited until such time as the pupils of his eyes had had time to expand. Instead of waiting he goes straight ahead in the dark, or what is the dark to him, and then he stumbles and has an accident. It seems to me that, under these circumstances, there is really no negligence whatsoever on the part of the defenders; and, on the other hand, there was clear carelessness on the part of the pursuer himself.

It seems to me that the case is really on all-fours with what was truly decided in the case of Forsyth v. Ramage & Ferguson.[1] That decision was, I think, an absolutely proper one; but it is cited in an unfortunate way when it is cited, as it was in the case of Jamieson,[2] as if it laid down a proposition about a ship in the course of construction. There is no magic in the words "in the course of construction." Ramage & Ferguson's case[1] was decided on relevancy; it was not a case where there had been proof. The whole question was whether there was a relevant averment of negligence on the part of the defenders, and it was so treated by Lord President Inglis. Of course, in seeing whether there was a relevant case, it was of great moment to point out that it is not relevant to say that in a ship in course of construction there are a great many holes and unfenced places about, because everybody knows that in a ship in the course of construction there must so be. "In the course of construction" was simply mentioned as indicating what is the natural condition of a ship while it is being built. This is only one particular illustration of a much more general rule, and the general rule is this, that you must take a place according to its natural circumstances; and, accordingly, I think that, when you go down a ship which is in the course of repair, you must expect that, very likely, hatches will be open, and must exercise ordinary caution. On this ground, I think the Sheriff-principal's judgment was right, and that the appeal ought to be refused.

Lord Adam.—I am of the same opinion. The facts, in respect of which this action was raised, occurred on board a ship called the "Janetta," which at the time was, I understand, under repair, and for the purpose of repair had been handed over to the defenders—the contractors for the repair—and was entirely in their occupation. We were told she had been taken into their yard, and was entirely in their occupation; and that various squads of workmen were about the ship doing these repairs, besides the squad with which the pursuer was connected. That was the state of matters on board the ship. Now, the pursuer, on the morning of the accident, was hired by a man Barrie, in the employment of the defenders, who was in use to hire men for the defenders. It is not disputed that he was hired by Barrie, who was in fact in the employment, and was on the occasion in question a servant, of the defenders.

These being the facts, I do not think that there is any necessity of considering what might have been the case if the pursuer had been an outsider. We have to deal with the case of a servant—the pursuer—who was in the employment of the defenders. Well, unfortunately, on that morning, when going down to his work, he had to go down a hatchway, and, no doubt, coming out of broad daylight, he did not see about him when he first came down, and, in a moment or two, he stumbled and fell against an open hatchway, but was saved from going down to the bottom by falling against an iron bar. But, in so falling, he was very considerably injured, and it is in respect of these injuries the present action is raised.

Now, the fault which is alleged against the defenders is this: it is complained that this hatchway was uncovered at the time, and there is no doubt that that was so. Other workmen had been at work at the hatchway a short time before, and they had not covered the hatchway when leaving. It was said, in the first place, that that was fault; that they should have covered the hatchway, and that the defenders are responsible for that. And it was said that, not being covered, it was insufficiently lighted, that there was no artificial light, and that it should have been artificially lighted, because it was uncovered; and it is in respect of the hatchway being uncovered, and, in that condition, not being sufficiently lighted afterwards, that it was said that the defenders were liable. Now, I could quite have understood if it could have been said in this case that it was a duty on the defenders, or part of their system, to see that all hatchways were constantly covered, or, if not constantly covered, were always properly lighted, upon a ship of this kind, and that the neglect of that duty would have made them liable. But that is not said, and it cannot be said, because all these hatchways must necessarily be uncovered from time to time. On this particular occasion this hatchway was uncovered, because the workmen who had been working there after they finished their job neglected to cover it. Surely the foreman of the gang who left it uncovered was responsible for having left it uncovered. This being a limited company cannot make any difference in the world. A company like this cannot be supposed to have a man to go about after every gang to see that no hatchways are left uncovered. There is no such duty upon limited companies or upon individual employers. If the workmen had a duty to cover the hatchway, and if the hatchway is left uncovered it is the fault of the fellow-workmen. As there is no case here under the Employers Liability Act, it humbly appears to me that there is no other liability. The case we have to deal with is not a man going into a place where he was entitled to suppose that everything was secure, and that there were no traps or no hatches or no holes that he might fall down. That is not the case. We have the case of a workman who was being employed to do work with which he was acquainted, carried on in ships, and he must be presumed to have known that there must be open hatchways necessary for the accommodation of other workmen on board. It was laid down in the case of Ramage & Ferguson[1] that a man must be careful and proceed with great caution if it is dark, if he cannot see, if he is in a strange place, and should take such care as was necessary for his safety. Accordingly, if the light was insufficient, it was, in my humble judgment, the pursuer's own fault that he met with this accident.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am not of opinion that it has been proved in this case that the man Barrie, who engaged the pursuer, was an independent contractor, so as to shift the objective of responsibility from Henderson & Co. to him. But it does not appear to me that the question of fact has much, if any, bearing upon the decision of the case, because no intelligible case has been made of fault on the part of an employee of Henderson & Co. which would raise a question of common employment. Therefore, it seems to me that the question is whether the master has duly fulfilled the obligation, which every master undertakes, of making reasonable provision for the safety of the workmen who are engaged in performing his work. Now, that obligation, in the nature of things, can never be of an absolute, unqualified kind. There is hardly any employment where it is possible to secure the workman against risks which are incident to his trade; and, certainly, where a work of building—whether it be shipbuilding or masonry—is in progress, the unavoidable risks—the risks against which a master cannot guard his workpeople—are very much greater than in the case of men who are working in a completed establishment. Those others, again, may be exposed to risks of a different kind. When the late Lord President gave an exposition of his views on this question in the case of Forsyth v. Ramage & Ferguson,[1] he certainly did not intend to lay down an arbitrary rule confined to the case of buildings which were in the course of construction, because his Lordship there pointed out that, in the case of a ship in the course of construction, there were many risks against which it was impossible to guard, and especially in openings being necessarily left where they would not be left in the case of a completed ship. Now, that might either be because the ship had not reached the stage at which coverings for these openings would be provided, or it might be that, cover or no cover, they were necessarily left open for the accommodation and convenience of the men engaged in the work. It was the second point which his Lordship cited as the unavoidable risk, but not, as I think, with the view of excluding the first; and, of course, the same proposition applies to a ship which, although not in course of construction, is undergoing extensive repairs, on which many parts that are usually closed or covered have to be removed. The case, therefore, appears to me to be in point, allowing for the variations of fact which must occur in all cases that are cited for comparison. While in that case the question was relevancy, and while here we have to consider the liability resulting from the facts as proved, I can come to no other conclusion than that, in this case, the hatch which was left open was necessarily left open for the convenience of persons engaged in the repair work on the ship. Then as regards the lighting, there is no doubt it was necessary that some light should be provided; but it is in evidence that a parcel of candles was sent on board for the use of the workmen, and that each of the men had his candle before him; and it is clear that the pursuer, if he had wished a candle to guide his steps in going down to the lower deck, might have had one. I, therefore, am unable to see that there was any fault on the part of the defenders, either of the nature of failure to perform their duty by covering the hatches or by lighting them; and I agree that we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. The pursuer's counsel, in stating his case to us, did not base his claim upon the ground on which it was admittedly based in the Sheriff Court, and did not maintain that there was any liability on the part of the defenders arising out of a contract of employment, whether by the common law operating upon that contract or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act. He made no claim as a servant in the employment of the defenders upon the ground of liabilities arising out of the contract of service at all. But he founded upon a rule of law, which he says is quite established, as it probably is, that persons, when resorting to business premises, on the business of the owner or occupier of such premises, and using reasonable care for their own safety, are entitled to expect that the owner or occupier, on his part, will use reasonable care to prevent a danger to them from some unusual source of danger known to him and not known to them, or, in other words, as it is put in one of the cases, are entitled to expect that he will not allow his premises to be converted into a trap for persons who come to them upon business. Now, I think it may be very reasonable to maintain that there is such a rule, and that, on the other hand, it is applicable as much to a ship in dock as to houses and factories on land. But then it assumes that a man, using reasonable care for himself, is entitled to expect that he will be exposed to no such risk as, it afterwards turns out, he has been exposed to, and by which he has been injured; and I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and all your Lordships, that it is impossible to say that a man in the position of this pursuer, who says he was employed as a rivetter, to go on board a ship undergoing extensive repairs, and to help in chipping the rust off the shell of the boat, is entitled to expect that there will be no such thing as an open hatchway on the ship, the hold of which is being occupied by workmen engaged in repairing, and, therefore, that he will run no risk from tumbling down hatchways if he does not take reasonable care of himself. The pursuer, in this case, was exposed to no unusual danger and to no such danger as a man taking reasonable care for himself might not have expected to meet.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, dated 26th October 1904: Find that on

THOMAS CHALMERS HETHERINGTON, Complainer (Respondent).—Clyde, K.C.—MacRobert.

ALEXANDER GALT, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Craigie—D. Anderson.

Property—Boundaries—Line of trees planted as boundary under verbal agreement between adjacent feuars—Question with singular successor—Bounding Title—Measurements—"Or thereby"—Measurements inaccurate—Contemporanea Expositio.—Two adjacent plots of ground, belonging to different persons, were described in their titles by a plan and by measurements, qualified in the latter case by the words "or thereby." Neither plan nor measurements were strictly accurate. The mutual boundary was adjusted by verbal agreement between the proprietors and marked by a line of trees, planted at their mutual expense. Held that this arrangement, followed by possession in accordance therewith, was binding upon a singular successor without notice.

Common Property—Trees near boundary of adjacent properties.—Opinion (per Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary) that trees whose stems are wholly on one side of the boundary of two adjacent properties, but which stand so near the boundary as to extend their roots into the other side of it, are not the common property of both proprietors.

2D DIVISION. LdStormonth Darling.

IN August 1904 Thomas Chalmers Hetherington, proprietor of a property known as St Kitts, situated in Colinton Road, Edinburgh, presented a note of suspension and interdict against Alexander Galt, proprietor of a property known as Trengweath, also situated in Colinton Road, and adjoining St Kitts.

The complainer craved interdict against the respondent from cutting down or otherwise interfering with any of the trees growing along or upon the boundary between St Kitts and Trengweath.

The respondent proposed to cut down three trees which he maintained were wholly situate within his property, but which the complainer maintained were on the boundary. The question between the parties therefore came to be, what was the mutual boundary of the two properties.

The note having been passed, and interim interdict granted on caution, proof was allowed and led.

The facts were as follows:—By feu-charter, recorded 27th April 1883, John Dick Peddie and others, as trustees for the Craiglockhart Estate Company, disponed to George Thomas Beilby the two plots of ground afterwards known as Trengweath and St Kitts respectively.

The description of the plots in the feu-charter was as follows:—"In the first place [Trengweath], All and whole that piece of ground measuring 1 rood 24 poles 19 yards or thereby imperial measure, and bounded as follows, viz.:—On the north or north-west by a line running parallel to and at a distance of 6 feet south or south-east from the southern or south-eastern boundary of the public road from Edinburgh to Colinton, along which it extends 80 feet or thereby; on the west or south-west by unfeued ground belonging to us, along which it extends 220 feet or thereby; on the south or south-east by ground agreed to be feued to the said James Duncan, along which it extends 80 feet or thereby; and on the east or north-east by the piece of ground hereinafter disponed in the second place, along which it extends 220 feet or thereby: And in the second place [St Kitts], All and Whole that piece of ground measuring 2 roods 16 poles 29 yards or thereby imperial measure, and bounded as follows, viz.:—On the north or north-west by a line running parallel to and at a distance of 6 feet south or south-east from the southern or south-eastern boundary of the said road from Edinburgh to Colinton, along which it extends 120 feet or thereby; on the west or south-west by the piece of ground before disponed in the first place, along which it extends 220 feet or thereby; on the south or south-east by ground agreed to be feued to the said James Duncan, along which it extends 120 feet or thereby; and on the east or north-east also by ground agreed to be feued to the said James Duncan, along which it extends 220 feet or thereby . . . As the said two pieces of ground are delineated and coloured green on a plan or sketch thereof annexed and signed as relative hereto."

By disposition, recorded 15th May 1883, Beilby disponed Trengweath to Henry Kenward Shiells. The description in the disposition was the same as in the feu-charter.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling):—"When Beilby and Shiells came to lay off their grounds it was found that the plan of the whole block appended to the feu-charter was not perfectly accurate. The plan shewed a rectangular block measuring 200 feet both in front and at the back, of which St Kitts was to have 120 feet or thereby, and Trengweath 80 feet or thereby, front and back. The actual measurement shewed about 201 feet on the Colinton Road and about 199 feet to the back. There was a clause requiring the erection of boundary walls on all sides of both feus, but the feuars arranged with the superiors that they should not insist on the erection of a wall between the two feus, and that the line of march should be indicated by a row of trees. The feuars proceeded to have this done, and the trees were bought and planted at joint expense, on a line mutually agreed on and staked out before the planting was commenced. The line drawn was practically straight, except where a slight bend into the ground of St Kitts was made in order to leave more room for the drive up to the door of Trengweath, which was in a cutting. The trees were planted before Whitsunday 1884. No writing passed, but the two feuars continued to possess their respective grounds in accordance with the agreement. When any trees in the row had to be cut, as sometimes happened, it was done by mutual consent. About eight years ago Mr Beilby put up, at his own expense, a light fence of wire netting, and as this was mainly to keep animals of his own from straying into his neighbour's ground, he erected the fence on his own side of the row of trees and entirely at his own expense. All this stands upon evidence which is absolutely uncontradicted.

"The complainer acquired St Kitts from Mr Beilby on 6th April 1902. He was told at the time of his purchase about the agreement as to the row of trees, and so long as Shiells remained owner of Trengweath, there was no change of possession. But Shiells sold Trengweath to the respondent in May 1904, with entry at Whitsunday 1904, and there is a conflict of evidence as to whether Shiells informed the respondent's agent, as undoubtedly he ought to have done, of the agreement about the row of trees. In this state of matters, I cannot hold it proved that he did give the information. Certainly the respondent himself never heard of it till 11th July 1904, when the complainer, having heard that the respondent proposed to fell some trees in the row, wrote to him telling him of the old agreement, and offering to see him on the subject. Unfortunately this suggestion was not adopted, and the matter passed into the hands of the law-agents."

No. 128. June 2, 1905. Hetherington v. Galt.

The descriptions in the disposition of St Kitts by Mr Beilby to the complainer, and in the disposition of Trengweath by Mr Shiells to the respondent, were the same as those in the feu-charter.

The trees planted in 1884 to form the boundary, except those in the bend, were all slightly—not more than about a foot in any case—to the west or Trengweath side of a line drawn from north to south 80 feet from the western boundary of Trengweath. The respondent's surveyor witnesses deponed that these trees were also nearly all very slightly, but wholly, to the Trengweath side of a line drawn 120 feet from the eastern boundary of St Kitts.

On 6th December 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, proof, and productions, suspends, interdicts, prohibits and discharges in terms of the note of suspension and interdict: Declares the interdict formerly granted perpetual, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—This is an unfortunate dispute about a very small matter between the owners of two adjoining villas on the outskirts of Edinburgh, the action being one of suspension and interdict. The actual question raised is whether the respondent, who is the owner of the villa called Trengweath, is to be interdicted from cutting down, or otherwise interfering at his own hand with, any of the trees which the complainer, who is owner of the villa called St Kitts, asserts to be growing on the boundary between the two properties. The respondent at present only proposes to cut down three trees which are said to be too close to the others, and, I daresay, would be better away. But that is not a question for me, and the problem really involved is what is the true boundary between the feus. If the trees are on the line of march, they are undoubtedly common property, and cannot be removed without the consent of both proprietors.

"The feus were given off practically at the same time in 1883, although, for convenience, the feu-charter was taken in name of Mr Beilby, who was to have the larger of the two feus, viz., St Kitts, and he disponed to Mr Shiells, who was to have the smaller feu, viz., Trengweath. The feu-charter was recorded on 27th April 1883, and the disposition not till 15th May. But the dimensions of the two feus were separately described in the feu-contract, and this description, so far as it related to Trengweath, was exactly reproduced in the disposition by Beilby to Shiells. I do not think that anything turns on the fact that, for conveyancing purposes, Beilby was for a short time vested in the right to both plots of ground. So far as the present question is concerned, I think that the transactions must be regarded as simultaneous"—(His Lordship then narrated the facts, ut supra).

"The respondent's case is that he is not bound by any verbal agreement between the former proprietors, even though followed by prescriptive possession, and that, having bought on the faith of the recorded titles, he is

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—A line drawn 80 feet from the western boundary of Trengweath in accordance with the respondent's title gave him all the trees except in the bend, and a line drawn 120 from the eastern boundary of St Kitts gave the respondent nearly the whole of them. Both the titles here were bounding titles.[1] The line of trees was not consistent with the titles. Assuming the arrangement to have been made to make the trees the boundary, it involved the conveyance to the complainer's author of property which was within the respondent's title and not within the complainer's. The respondent could only be bound by such an agreement if it was embodied in a writing registered in the Register of Sasines. He was only bound by what appeared in the titles on faith of which he entitled to the boundary as therein defined. His plea would, I think, be well founded if the complainer's contention involved any material deviation from the boundary in the titles. But it cannot be said that there is any material deviation. The titles do not define the boundary except by measurements, which are not precisely accurate, and do not profess to be so, for every measurement is qualified by the words 'or thereby.' If there had been 120 feet for St Kitts and 80 feet for Trengweath, both in the front and at the back, it would have been possible to draw a mathematically straight line from the point at which these measurements met in front to the point where they met at the back. There being a foot more than the titles gave for both plots in the front, and a foot less for both plots at the back, some slight re-adjustment was necessary; and when the persons with the full right to make the adjustment made it in a way satisfactory to themselves, and exhibited the line by marks visible on the ground, and possession for more than twenty years followed, I cannot hold that even a singular successor is entitled to reopen the whole question. I should say the same even if there had been no inaccuracy in measurement, and the slight deviation in the line of march had been caused by something in the lie of the ground—something, in short, which was not merely a matter of temporary or personal convenience. No doubt a row of trees is not a fence, but marchstones are not a fence, and if the boundary had been indicated by marchstones so near the boundary given in the titles as sufficiently to indicate their purpose, I cannot doubt that a singular successor would have been held bound by them. The deviation in this case is so slight as to be measured only by inches. Mr Bennett, the surveyor who was examined for the respondent, gives the exact distance of some of the trees from the imaginary straight line in the titles, and the distance is in no case more than a foot, generally only a few inches. No doubt his measurements all have the effect of throwing the line of trees into the respondent's property, but when a line intended as a march, and prescriptively possessed as a march, is so close an approximation to the title-boundary as that, it is, I think, sufficiently covered by the qualifying words 'or thereby,' and so no question of bounding title really arises.

"At all events, it seems to me that the existence of the row of trees ought to have put the respondent on his inquiry. It would be vain for him to say that the wire-netting fence misled him, and he does not say so. This fence is of a slight construction, with none of the substantiality of a mutual fence; and it is not in a straight line. Neither the respondent nor his agent professes to have considered the question of boundary from anything which they saw on the ground; their sole reliance is on the titles. A pur-bought. The row of trees was not sufficient to put the respondent on his inquiry. If anything on the ground indicated the boundary, it was the wire fence. Ex facie of the titles there was no vagueness in the boundaries. It had never before even been contended that the words "or thereby" could make a definite boundary indefinite. "Or thereby" merely meant as nearly as can be ascertained and represented by surveyors. As regards the alleged difficulty arising from inaccuracy in the measurements, there would have been no difficulty in giving the respondent's author the full 80 feet to which he was entitled under the description, as both plots then belonged, and had been originally conveyed to the same person, and he was bound, if it was possible, to give the full amount which his disposichaser is not bound to inspect the ground which he is purchasing for any glaring deviation from the description in the titles, but when measurements in that description are qualified by inexact words like 'or thereby,' I do not think that he is safe to rely on the measurements being minutely accurate, and I do think he is bound to take note of any visible object which may serve to explain the description.

"None of the cases cited seemed to me of much assistance, and I do not myself remember any that would be, unless, perhaps, Strang v. Steuart, 2 Macph. 1015, affirmed 4 Macph. (H. L.) 5. In that case there are some clear expressions of opinion to the effect that adjoining proprietors may contract with each other that a fence shall be erected at mutual expense as a march fence, or that a fence not originally so erected may be treated as such, and, if so treated for the prescriptive period, must be recognised and maintained as a march fence by singular successors. The actual proof in that case did not satisfy the Court that there had been any adoption of the fence (which consisted of a hedge and ditch) as a march. Here the case is not one of adoption, and the proof of agreement is clear. If agreement had been proved in Strang v. Steuart, it is plain that the judgment would have been the other way. There was a difference between that case and the present inasmuch as the titles there merely described the two properties as bounded by each other. But I think I make sufficient allowance for the difference when I concede that the respondent here would not have been bound by the agreement made and acted on by the former proprietors, if it had involved any material deviation from the boundary indicated in the titles, and if there had been nothing on the ground to mark what the boundary so agreed on was.

"The complainer maintained as an alternative argument that if the trees in question are on the respondent's side of the march, they are so near the march, and derive so much of their nourishment from the complainer's soil, that they must be regarded in law as common property. There are passages both in the Digest and the Institutes (Dig. xli. 1, 7, 13, and Inst. ii. 1, 31) which bear that if a tree was planted so near a boundary as to extend its roots into the land of a neighbour, it was regarded by the civilians as common property. But I do not think that this rather vague rule has ever been adopted by the law of Scotland. Certainly in the somewhat analogous case of a proprietor's tree extending its branches over the ground of his neighbour, the case of Halkerston, (1781), M. 10,495, shews that the result is not to give the neighbour any joint right of property in the tree, but merely to give him a right to demand that the owner of the ground in which the tree stands shall lop the overhanging branches.

"Accordingly I think the sole question here is whether the trees proposed to be cut are on the march, in which case they are common property, or on the respondent's ground, in which case they are wholly his. Being of opinion that they are on the march, I shall make the interdict formerly granted perpetual."

tion to the respondent's author bore to convey. In any view, the arrangement as to the boundary could only be effectual against the respondent if it had been followed by possession for the prescriptive period. There had not been even twenty years' possession, for the trees were planted in 1884, and there had been no possession beyond the wire fence since 1902. With regard to the case of Strang v. Steuart[1] and the opinions there expressed,[2] the Judges did not say how an agreement with regard to a march fence could be proved in a question with a singular successor. The question there was with regard to expense and upkeep of a march fence, and there was no question of conveyance of property.

Argued for the complainer and respondent;—The measurements were all wrong if taken strictly, but they were meant to be merely approximate, and were advisedly qualified by the words "or thereby." The boundary as indicated by the measurements was ambiguous. It was found when laying off the ground that the measurements could not be exactly satisfied in fixing the boundary. The titles in this respect required interpretation. They were interpreted by the arrangement between the proprietors to fix the boundary on the line of the trees, and the interpretation was shewn on the ground by the trees. There was no better way of interpreting an ambiguous description than to find how it was interpreted by the feuars when the ground was laid off, and by looking at the ground itself and what was on it. This was a question of interpretation of the title, not of prescriptive possession. It was a question of identifying a doubtful boundary, and the boundary was fixed in a way not contradictory but interpretative of the titles, and shewn upon the ground by the line of trees. The arrangement once made was binding upon singular successors. An agreement to give one of the proprietors additional ground might not have been binding on a singular successor, but here the agreement was merely to fix the true boundary line. But in any view, fixing the boundary by the line of trees did not involve any greater deviation from the title than was covered by the words "or thereby." This was so, even if the complainer had got 8 inches or a foot too much. In England it had been said that "or thereabouts" might cover 10 or even 20 acres in 100.[3] Possession on the agreement fixing the boundary was not necessary,[4] certainly not prescriptive possession. The boundary was shewn on the ground, and was patent to a purchaser. He was bound to look and see what the boundary de facto was, and especially so where the boundary was doubtful. If he purchased a property with the boundary so patent, he must be held to have acquiesced in getting only what was on his side of that boundary.[5] Although possession was not necessary, it was proved that the possession here had been in accordance with the agreement as to the boundary, and that for more than twenty years. Where there was dubiety as to the boundary on the titles the state of possession decided the question.[1] Here the position was that the complainer had a title to 120 feet, and had possessed 120 feet, while the respondent had a title to 80 feet, but had not possessed 80 feet. That was enough to decide the present controversy in favour of the complainer.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts to be considered in this case are (1) that the plot of ground which is divided into two feus, now belonging to the parties to this case respectively, was, according to the original feuing plan, rectangular, measuring 200 feet both front and back; (2) that when it came to be divided it was found that it was not rectangular, but measured 201 feet at the front and 199 feet at the back, so that it was not possible in dividing it up into two feus to draw any line of division which should give correctly rectangular plots; (3) that an arrangement was come to and assented to by the superior, that instead of erecting a boundary wall between the two feus, the line of division was to be marked off by a line of trees, planted at the joint expense of the feuars, and in a line staked off by mutual agreement; (4) that this line was by agreement made not exactly straight, it being a convenience to one of the feuars that at one point, to make the approach to his house more convenient, a slight curve should be made in the line fixed to bound the properties; (5) that the trees were planted accordingly and the feus possessed in accordance with the arrangement come to; (6) that when it was thought desirable to thin the trees, those to be removed were agreed upon by both feuars; (7) that when the complainer took his feu from Mr Beilby, in whose name the original feu-charter of the whole ground had been taken, he was informed of the arrangements above noted, and he and the then feuar of the other feu, Mr Shiells, acted in accordance with the agreement; (8) that Shiells sold to the respondent, but it is not proved that he told him of the arrangement.

These being the facts, the present dispute has arisen in consequence of the respondent proposing to fell some of the trees as being on his feu without the consent of the complainer, and declining to confer with him on the matter.

In considering what are the rights of parties I lay out of view altogether the fact that a light wire fence was erected by Mr Beilby on his own ground, as I do not see how that can affect the question at issue. It is not in any sense of the nature of a permanent erection, and was not intended as a designation of march boundaries, and was never treated as such.

It is to be noted that, in addition to the fact that the measurements are not in accordance with the description, the titles expressly modify each measurement given by the words "or thereby," and therefore if the respondent takes his stand, as he does, upon the titles, he is faced by this expression, which, if it means anything at all, must mean that slight variations might be unavoidable, and would in the establishment of the two feus call for some adjustment on the division of the plot. Had he inquired, as I agree with the Lord Ordinary he was called on to do, he would have ascertained that adjustment had been made and the march settled by the planting of the trees. Any deviation there is from a straight line is of the slightest, and the words "or thereby" may reasonably be held to cover it. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that, although the line of trees is not in a strict sense a fence, they are just as sufficient a mode of marking a boundary as march stones, and that if adjoining feuars choose to use them as such, such an adjustment of the march may bind a singular successor. I make no comments on the cases quoted, except to say that I adopt the Lord Ordinary's view on them.

On the whole matter, I see no ground for interfering with the judgment under review, and would move that it be affirmed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary. The case as presented to us perhaps touched some questions of delicacy—questions, I mean, as to the extent to which singular successors are affected by things done or suffered by their predecessors in title. But when the exact situation is understood, I think it is fairly clear that the Lord Ordinary's judgment may be sufficient without trenching on any rule of law and keeping well outside the region of controversy. The important considerations are, it appears to me, these:

(1) In the first place it is proved, and indeed not disputed, that the row of trees in question was planted by the respective authors of the complainer and respondent at mutual expense, and at the time when the original feu was divided between them.

(2) In the next place, it is also proved that it was so planted in order to denote the line of march between the two properties from north to south, as that line of march had been adjusted and settled between them, which it required to be, inter alia, by reason of certain difficulties in the measurements contained in the titles.

Again it is, I think, also clear that the adjustment so made, although probably more or less connected with the existence of the said difficulties, was in itself quite consistent with the titles—that is to say, consistent not only with the original feu-charter, but also the disposition in the respondent's favour. It was so consistent for this, if for no other, reason, that all the measurements in the titles were throughout qualified by the words "or thereby," leaving a latitude clearly, in my opinion, sufficient to cover the alleged minute discrepancies or variations on which the respondent founds.

These are, it appears to me, the important facts, and such being the position (the adjustment made being consistent with the title, and being also proper and necessary and followed by possession) I have, I confess, no difficulty in concluding that the adjustment of the march was and is effectual not only as against the original owners but also against singular successors. It was so, in my opinion, if for no other reason, on the principle of contemporanea expositio, followed by possession and actings of parties which were themselves similarly interpretative, and by the interpretation involved in which it cannot be doubted that singular successors are affected and bound.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I have considered this case very carefully, and concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and of your Lordships. The question is not without nicety and novelty. A row of trees is not a very common kind of fence, but in this case it certainly was in appearance, as it is proved to have been in fact, intended to indicate the march between these two properties. There was nothing else to indicate the boundary. The netting was not in fact meant as a fence. There was no agreement that it should be so. I think it is the same as if it had been a hedge or a wall. The configuration of the ground required some divergence from a mathematical line between the two subjects, and the terms of the title specially provided for it. I think the row of trees formed a march fence within the latitude allowed by the title. It was not against, but in accordance with, the right of parties as expressed in the titles.

stitute (Sym) at Perth awarded compensation, and at the request of the burgh stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The respondent was employed by the Road Department of the Corporation of Perth to break stones. These stones consisted of old street pavement and causeway blocks. . . . A piece of dirt, or a chip of stone, injured one of his eyes. . . . The place in which the accident happened was a yard belonging to the Corporation, part of their gas undertaking, but used at the time by the Road Department. . . . The yard was about 60 poles in extent, 100 yards long by 17 wide. It was used for storage of pipes, concrete, and other materials used in the making and repairing of drains and roads. It contained also the bings of stone which the respondent and other men were breaking. . . . At the side of it was a large shed, 30 feet long by 23 feet wide, in which implements were kept, and which was used for men to work in in wet weather. No mechanical power was used in the yard. The materials in the yard were used in the repair of roads under the charge of the Road Department, and in carrying out works ordered by the Corporation, and which private individuals had elected to leave it to the Corporation to do, and had to pay for; also, to a small extent, in doing work by contract for private individuals.

"It was maintained that this yard was a 'warehouse' in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that it was not necessary to bring it within the definition that it must be a place in which manual labour was exercised for gain, and in which mechanical power was used in aid of a manufacturing process carried on in it." *

The Sheriff-substitute "was of opinion that 'factory' covers every 'warehouse,' and that 'warehouse' covers a place of deposit of goods as well as a place of sale, and therefore covered this yard."

The question of law was,—"Was the yard which I have described a 'warehouse,' and therefore a 'factory,' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act?" †

* In the case the Sheriff-substitute referred to Stevens v. General Steam Navigation Co., L. R. [1903], 1 K. B. 890, and Willmott v. Paton, L. R. [1902], 1 K. B. 237.

† The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), enacts:—

Sec. 7. "(1) This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined, on or in or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work. . . .

"(2) In this Act" (inter alia)—

"'Factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and every laundry worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power."

The Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 22), (which under the Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 63), comes in place of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895), is divided into ten PARTS, of which the Fifth is—

"PART V. SPECIAL MODIFICATIONS AND EXTENSIONS."

Part V. Embraces sections 87 to 106 of the Act, grouped under seven headings, viz.:—"(i.) Tenement Factories." "(ii.) Cotton Cloth and other Humid Factories." "(iii.) Bakehouses." "(iv.) Laundries." "(v.) Docks." "(vi.) Buildings." "(vii.) Railways." M'Ewan v. Magistrates of Perth.

Argued for the appellants;—The yard could be a factory only if it was a "warehouse." The Acts did not contain any definition of "warehouse," consequently the word must be construed in its ordinary meaning. The appellants' yard was not a warehouse in the usual and proper sense of the term. A warehouse was a place used mainly for commercial purposes,[1] and did not include every place in which goods were deposited. But even if it were a warehouse in the ordinary sense of the word, it was not a warehouse to which any provision of the Factory and Workshop Act applied. The reference to "warehouse" in section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901,[2] was not to warehouses in general, but only to warehouses associated with, or contiguous to, a dock, wharf, or quay, or to warehouses ejusdem generis.[3] This appeared from its collocation with the words "dock, wharf, and quay" in section 104, and from the heading "Docks," which, being part of the statute, must be considered in construing the section.[4] This heading differed from that to the corresponding

The Fifth heading embraces one section only—the 104th—as follows:—

"(v.) Docks.

"104—(1) The provisions of this Act with respect to—

(i.) Power to make orders as to dangerous machines (section seventeen);

(ii.) Accidents;

(iii.) Regulations for dangerous trades;

(iv.) Powers of inspectors (section one hundred and nineteen); and

(v.) Fines in case of death or injury (section one hundred and thirty-six);

shall have effect as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and all machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal were included in the word 'factory,' and the purpose for which the machinery or plant is used were a manufacturing process; and as if the person who by himself, his agents, or workmen, uses any such machinery or plant for the before-mentioned purpose were the occupier of the premises; and for the purpose of the enforcement of these provisions the person having the actual use or occupation of any dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or of any premises within the same, or forming part thereof, and the person so using any such machinery or plant shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory.

"(2) For the purpose of this section the expression 'plant' includes any gangway or ladder used by any person employed to load or unload or coal a ship, and the expressions 'ship' and 'harbour' have the same meaning as in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894."

The corresponding section (sec. 23) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 37), was in the Part of that Act entitled "SPECIAL RULES AND REQUIREMENTS," and was under the heading "Docks, &c." section in the Act of 1895, which was "Docks, &c."[1] This yard was not a place to which the provisions as to notice of occupation (sec. 127) or registration (sec. 129) could apply, and the reference to "business" in section 127 shewed that the warehouse must be one used for commercial purposes.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—This yard was a warehouse in the ordinary sense of the word. In Webster's Dictionary warehouse was defined as "a storehouse for wares or goods." It was not essential that it should be a place conducted for purposes of gain in the ordinary sense,[3] and in any event a certain amount of profit was made by the Corporation on the operations carried on there. The term warehouse was not modified by the words "dock, quay, or wharf" in section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901,[4] but included all warehouses wherever situated. The yard was not excluded from the definition of a warehouse merely because it was uncovered.[5] Being a remedial statute, the Workmen's Compensation Act should be construed liberally.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Two questions present themselves in this case, (1) whether the place described in the facts as found by the Sheriff can be properly designated as a "warehouse," and (2) whether, if it can be so designated, such a warehouse is one to which the Factory Act of 1901 applies, by which it is declared that the provisions of the Act with regard to accidents shall have effect "as if every dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse," &c., were included in the word "factory."

My opinion is that both these questions should be answered in the negative. Taking all the facts stated by the Sheriff, they do not in my judgment describe a warehouse in any true sense. The Sheriff proceeds on the ground that the "word warehouse covers a place of deposit of goods as well as a place of sale, and therefore covers this yard." Such a view is sufficiently startling. It seems to be the logical sequence from it that any place in which goods are stored is a warehouse, with the result in sequence that it is a factory, and that therefore any employee connected with the owner who meets with an accident is entitled to compensation on the footing that he was employed in a "factory" in the sense of the Factory Act. That is a view to which I cannot give my assent. There is no definition of "warehouse" to guide us in interpreting its meaning, and therefore it must be interpreted according to its ordinary meaning, and most certainly it is not an ordinary meaning of the word warehouse that it "covers a place of deposit of goods," i.e., every place where goods are deposited. If it does not cover every place, then some places must be differentiated from others, and it is difficult to conceive how any place where goods were deposited could be held not to be a warehouse if this storing yard for road mending materials and plant must be held to be a warehouse. It is impossible to believe that any sane person could describe it as a warehouse except upon the view of the Sheriff, for which there seems to me to be no foundation—that deposit of goods per se creates a warehouse at the place where the deposit is made.

This view makes it unnecessary to consider the second question, viz., whether supposing this place to be a warehouse the statutory provisions apply to it so as to bring it within them. I am of opinion that they cannot. The word "warehouse" where it occurs is in such collocation that it is to me plain that it cannot apply to such a place as we are dealing with, even though it fell under the ordinary description of a warehouse. It occurs under a division of the statute which is headed "Docks," and there is high authority for saying that such a heading should be looked to in considering to what the clauses under it apply, these headings being part of the statute as distinguished from the marginal rubrics, which are not parts of it, but only inserted by the printer for convenience of reference, and which may be modified at any time to cover amendments that have been made while the bill was under consideration. If this be so, I see no ground for holding that the word "warehouse" under that heading is to be held to refer to any warehouse a hundred miles inland and having no connection with a dock or similar place. And I should hold it to be a totally strained and unnatural reading to apply it to such a place where the whole context, both before and after it, plainly points to the subject-matter that is being dealt with being connected with shipping work. For the words are "as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and all machinery and plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal were included in the word 'factory.'" It was pointed out to us, and the Sheriff refers to it in the case, that it has been held in England that the meaning of the word "warehouse" is not modified by the above collocation. That is, in other words, to say that a word in the middle of a sentence is to be divorced from all association with the heading under which it is found or with the rest of the sentence which is before and after it, and be read as if it stood by itself. I find myself unable to do so. To do so would be to carry the principle of giving a liberal reading to a remedial statute to a very extreme point, contrary, as I hold, to all reasonable rules of construction, under which words are not to be divorced from their context and given a reading as if they stood by themselves. The clause seems to me to be plainly intended to deal with subjects connected with water transit, and I am not prepared to isolate one word and thereby give it an extended meaning, which it is plain to me cannot have been intended when the clause was passed, and which can only be reached by ignoring the whole context in which the word is found.

On these grounds I come to the conclusion that the only question of law on which our opinion is asked should be answered in the negative.

LORD KYLLACHY.—The question in this case is whether the yard or enclosed space in which this accident happened is a "factory" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897. It is common ground that it must be held to be so if it be a "warehouse" within the meaning of the 104th section of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1901. For if it be such a warehouse it is a place to which beyond doubt some provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act apply. And being such a place it falls within the definition of the word "factory" contained in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Compensation Act. On the other hand, it is equally common ground that, unless it be a warehouse in the sense of section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, it cannot upon any other ground be brought within the scope of the Compensation Act. That is to say, it cannot in any other way become a "factory," either directly under the Act of 1897 or indirectly under the Act of 1901.

Accordingly the case depends on the just construction of section 104 of the 1901 Act. And as to that section there are two points to be noted.

The first point is, that it is a section which stands by itself under a separate heading, viz., "(v.) Docks," and forms under that heading one of the seven compartments of Part V. of the Act, of which part the six other compartments are—(1) Tenement Factories, (2) Cotton Cloth and other humid factories, (3) Bakehouses, (4) Laundries, (6) Buildings, (7) Railways.

The second point is this, that the purpose of the 104th section is to apply to docks, wharfs, quays, warehouses, &c., certain provisions of the Factory Act, viz., those relating to "Dangerous Machines," "Accidents," "Dangerous Trades," "Powers of Inspection," and "Fines in case of death or injury," the enacting words being directed to making that application which is declared to operate "to the same effect as if such dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, &c., were included in the word 'factory.'" In other words the context of the section deals merely with docks, and premises and plant used in connection with docks.

It is perhaps a third observation that in the previous Act of 1895 the corresponding compartment or section is headed "Docks, &c.," and that in the present Act—the consolidating Act of 1901—the expression is "Docks" without the "&c."

In these circumstances if the word "warehouse," occurring in a section or compartment so headed, and having such a context, is to be construed in the usual way and on ordinary principles, I confess to being quite unable te see how by any stretch of construction it can be read as covering a yard in the city of Perth "used for the storage of pipes, cement, and other material used in the making of roads," and for the breaking of road metal and its storage in bings. It appears to me that, if any effect is to be given to the heading of the section and to the context in which the word in question occurs, the reference must be held to be not to warehouses generally, but to dock warehouses—warehouses used in connection with docks. And as to the effect of "headings" in Acts of Parliament (as distinguished from mere marginal notes), I have as yet heard nothing to displace or to qualify the doctrine laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Inglis v. Robertson & Baxter,[1] and in the previous case of Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand,[2] and also by the Court of Justiciary in the case of Nelson v. M'Phee, October 17, 1889.[3]

M'Ewan v. Magistrates of Perth.

It is said that it has been held in England that the Compensation Act of 1897 may apply to a warehouse which has no connection with docks, and is not even ejusdem generis with dock warehouses, but so far as appears the effect to be given to the "heading" or "head line" of the 104th section of the Factory Act was not there raised or considered. Nor does it appear to have been pointed out that the word "&c." used in the Act of 1895 had been, as I have said, dropped in the consolidating Act of 1901. In any case I cannot, speaking for myself, be a party to ignoring both the heading and the general tenor of the 104th section. Nor am I prepared upon any ground of policy to construe that section in a manner opposed, as it seems to me, to the ordinary principles of construction.

It is not, however, necessary in this case to decide anything adverse to any previous decision or expression of judicial opinion. For supposing it to be held that the word "warehouse" falls to be read without reference to heading or context, and in its ordinary sense as used in common speech, I am still of the same opinion. I do not consider that the word "warehouse" in any proper or usual sense includes every store or depot in which persons, public or private, may store goods or materials which they are using from time to time or intend to use in the future. Farmers have such stores; owners of estates have them; public bodies have them; and it would, I think, be a very extreme conclusion that such stores or depots should be held as warehouses, and as such subject not only to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, but by consequence also to the whole provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act with respect to "inspection," "fines in the case of death or injury," and the other matters which I have mentioned. I consider that, taking the word "warehouse" in its widest sense as commonly used, it can only apply to premises wholly or mainly used for commercial purposes, and that it cannot therefore apply to the yard or depot in question.

I am therefore of opinion that the question of law stated by the Sheriff falls to be answered in the negative.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—This is a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, David M'Ewan, was employed by the appellants, the Magistrates of Perth, to break stones, and while so engaged he suffered an injury to one of his eyes, and he now sues for compensation from his employers, and the Sheriff-substitute has decided in his favour.

The appellants, the Magistrates of Perth, have raised only one question, and subject to that question they, as I understand, admit the respondent's right to compensation. But they maintain that he is not entitled to the benefit of the Act, because the place where the accident happened is not covered by its terms.

The place is distinctly described by the Sheriff-substitute. It was, he says, a yard 100 yards long by 17 wide. It was used for storage of materials employed in making and repairing drains and roads. It contained also the bings of stone which the respondent and other men were breaking. At the side of it was a large shed in which implements were kept, and which was used for men to work in in wet weather. "No mechanical power was used in the yard." The materials were used in the repair of roads, and in carrying out works ordered by the Corporation, "and which private individuals had elected to leave it to the Corporation to do and had to pay for, and also to a small extent in doing work by contract for private individuals."

The Sheriff-substitute has expressed the opinion "that 'factory' covers every warehouse," and that "'warehouse' covers a place of deposit of goods as well as a place of sale, and therefore covered this yard." His meaning is that the place which he describes and calls a place of deposit of goods is a warehouse in the sense of this Act, and that if it is a warehouse it is a factory. I think the latter proposition was not disputed, and the Sheriff expresses the question of law submitted thus—"Was this yard a warehouse, and therefore a factory within the meaning of the Act?"

The question depends primarily on the first part of the 7th section of the Act, under which section the respondent must bring his case, and which provides (section 7, subsection 1) that "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work." The rest of the subsection clearly does not apply, and it is unnecessary to quote it. The question is, whether this yard was a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work, and it would be absurd to suggest that the yard should be held to be described or covered by the words or terms railway, mine, quarry, or engineering work, the yard being certainly none of these. The only question is, whether it can be said to be a "factory" in the sense of the Act. That is a term which depends for its meaning almost entirely on the Workmen's Compensation Act and on the Factory Acts. Now, the 2d subsection of section 7 seems to profess to interpret the word "factory." It does not, strictly speaking, do so, but refers for the interpretation to other statutes, viz., the Factory Acts, and it provides that "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and "also that it includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshops Act, 1895."

This application seems made by section 23 of the Factory Act of 1895, which provided (but it is itself repealed) that certain sections and provisions of the Factory Acts enumerated "shall have effect as if—(a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse were included in the word 'factory.'" From which it follows undoubtedly that the term "factory" as used in the 7th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act includes a warehouse (that is the point of importance), for it does not signify to this case whether docks, wharfs, and quays should be factories, since it is certain that the yard in question cannot possibly be held to be either a dock or a wharf or quay. But it is said that it may be described as a warehouse, which is an unlikely but not an impossible interpretation, so that the matter seems to stand thus—The Act applies to factories, and a warehouse is a factory. Hence the Act applies to warehouses. Now, that a warehouse is a factory is a result arrived at by an interpretation of the words of the Act, and there is no doubt about it. But that conclusion cannot avail the respondent unless he can go a step further, and shew that the yard in question is a warehouse in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Not only that a warehouse is a factory, in which I think he succeeds, but also that the yard in question is in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act a warehouse, which is a much more difficult but also a more special point.

Now, this latter is a question to the solution of which the Act gives very little assistance. The Act has not a very copious interpretation clause, but it does give interpretations of various terms. But there is no interpretation of the word warehouse, probably because it was thought that none was required, and that seems to indicate that the Legislature intended that the word should receive its ordinary and, so to speak, popular and colloquial meaning, and I think the question is whether the word warehouse used in its ordinary meaning, since it has no statutory meaning, can be properly applied to the yard described in the stated case. It seems to me that cannot be done without a very strained and artificial interpretation, and I think that this case may be most simply solved by saying that no one would speak of this open yard, the chief purpose of which is to serve as a place of storage for materials and stones used in repairing the roads and drains of the town, as a warehouse, or as a place to any extent of the nature of a warehouse. The materials were not stored for sale, but merely heaped together for sake of convenience. That was the use to which the yard was ordinarily put. As I read the case, none of the materials were sold, but it may be that some profit was made if the burgh with their materials performed the work which they had ordered to be done by others. But that was not the general use or purpose of the yard. It was not a house, and it was not used for the storage of wares, so that it is at least very difficult to see the propriety of calling it a warehouse.

If such a gathering of stones and road materials were held to be a warehouse, which I think in the ordinary sense it is not, it is difficult to see where such methods of interpretation would stop. Every stackyard in the country would, for as strong or stronger reasons, be converted into a warehouse and a factory, and so, so far as I can see, would every heap of metal collected by a roadside to be broken and laid on the road. I think the Act has never been so interpreted, and that such an interpretation would be absurd.

I do not think that there are any special grounds derived from the terms of the Act which can be urged in favour of the view which the Sheriff-substitute has taken. There are considerations the other way. It has been argued for the appellants that the term warehouse as used in the Act should be read with a restricted meaning, and as confined to such warehouses only as were contiguous to the sea, and were naturally collocated with docks, wharfs, and quays, and signified only such warehouses as are usually found at docks, and harbours, and ports—such, for example, as bonded warehouses,—and that the Act would not apply to inland warehouses. This was argued on account of the manner in which the word is collocated with docks, wharfs, and quays throughout the Act, and also on account of the headings of the different sections of the Factory and Workshops Acts, 1895 and 1901, particularly the headings of "Docks, &c.," in the Act of 1895 before section 23, and the heading of "Docks" being the fifth division of the Act of 1901. It was maintained that these headings, unlike the side headings, formed parts of the statute, and that they had the effect of limiting the meaning of the word warehouses to warehouses at or near a dock or quay, or at least to warehouses of the same kind as those usually found at docks and quays. Assuming that these headings in the Factories Act are to be read as parts of the statute, I do not differ from the conclusion derived from that argument in this case, but I confess I feel some doubt as to the legitimacy of the argument. I feel some hesitation in accepting the view that these headings could have the effect of striking out of the statute all warehouses which were not contiguous to the sea. My view of the case does not necessitate such a sweeping conclusion, and I reach the same result by what I conceive to be an easier route, and I would prefer to reserve my opinion on these questions. Further, it is settled in the English Courts that contiguity to the sea is not essential to premises being designated as a warehouse, although apparently it may be a consideration which may bear on the question—Willmott v. Paton[1] and Green v. Britten.[2]

Reference was made in the argument to the fact that this yard was uncovered. It seems to have been settled in England that premises might be a warehouse though uncovered; still I think that that is a circumstance which might add to the difficulty of holding such premises to be so when the word warehouse is used in its ordinary meaning.

I am for recalling the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and finding that the yard was not a warehouse within the meaning of the Act.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which provides for compensation to persons injured in or about a "factory," enacts, sec. 7, that in that Act, "'factory' . . . includes any dock, wharf, quay . . . to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895."

Shipowners took a ship into a dry dock, which they had hired for the purpose of repairing the ship. A workman, who had served as ship's carpenter on board the ship during one voyage, and was engaged for her next voyage, in the interval between the voyages was employed by the shipowners in the work of repairing the ship. While engaged in unshackling the ship's cable, in order to turn it end for end, he fell into the dock, and sustained injuries from which he died.

Held that when the accident happened he was employed as a workman in the repair of a ship in or about a "factory," in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that the shipowners were liable to pay compensation.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, the widow of James Dickson, ship carpenter, as an individual, and as tutrix and administratrix-in-law for her pupil children, sought compensation in respect of his death from Cayzer, Irvine, & Company, shipowners, Glasgow.

The Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) awarded compensation, and at the request of Cayzer, Irvine, & Company stated a case, which bore that the following facts were established:—"(1) That the respondent is the widow of James Dickson . . . and has three children of the marriage . . . and that she and her children were wholly dependent upon the earnings of the deceased. (2) That on 11th March 1904 the appellants, between voyages, for cleaning and repairs, docked their s.s. 'Clan Fraser' in No. 3 Graving Dry Dock, Govan, which they had hired from the Clyde Navigation Trustees. 3. That James Dickson was engaged by the appellants as ship's carpenter on board this vessel. 4. That he had served during the previous voyage and was engaged for the voyage for which the vessel was preparing, and in the interval in dock he was employed by the appellants on board in the work of repair. 5. That on 11th March 1904 he was engaged on the forecastlehead in turning the ship's cable end for end, and while removing the shackle of the cable which passed through the ring of the anchor, he overbalanced and fell to the bottom of the dock and sustained injuries from which he died on the same day. 9. That the operation of unshackling the ship's cable on which the deceased was engaged at the time of the accident is, as a rule, done in dry dock, but that in emergencies it is done at sea, and it forms part of the duty of a ship's carpenter."

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute found in law that the accident happened to the deceased James Dickson when employed on, in, or about a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment; and that the appellants were the undertakers of the employment in the sense of the Act. He accordingly awarded compensation, and found the appellants liable in expenses.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was the employment in which the deceased James Dickson was engaged at the time of his death an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies?"

Argued for the appellants;—Even if it was taken as settled on the authority of Raine v. Jobson & Company[1] and other cases[2] that the dock was a constructive factory, the work in which the respondent was engaged at the time of the accident was not part of the ordinary work of this constructive factory. He was engaged in the ordinary employment of a seaman, and not on anything ordinarily incidental to work in this factory. There must be some connection between his employment and the business of the factory, and in this case, his work being the unshackling the ship's cable, there was no such connection.[1] The work of the factory was the repair of the ship, and the unshackling of the cable had no relation to the process of repair, but was part of the ordinary work of a seaman. It was work which, as was stated in the case, the respondent in his capacity of ship carpenter might be called on to do at sea. A ship carpenter came within the definition of "seaman," which included "every person" (with certain specified exceptions) "employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship."[2] Seamen were excluded from, or at least were not included in, the class of workmen benefited by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the mere fact that the ship was at the time of the accident in a dock, and the dock was a factory, did not entitle a seaman to compensation for injury sustained in performing his duties as a seaman.[3]

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very short point. It is stated by the learned Sheriff-substitute that James Dickson, the man who was injured, had been employed during the previous voyage as a ship's carpenter on board the vessel, and that the voyage had come to an end. He was also engaged for the next voyage which had not yet commenced. In the interval the shipowners employed him in assisting in the work of repairing the vessel which was then lying in No. 3 Graving Dry Dock, Govan, hired for the purpose from the Clyde Navigation Trustees. Under these circumstances it is clear that the dock became for the purposes of the Act constructively a factory.

The deceased man was engaged in work in or about this constructive factory, and therefore, as he was injured in the course of his work, the case is ruled by the decision in Raine v. Jobson,[4] in the House of Lords, unless it can be made out that the work in which he was engaged was not connected with the ordinary and usual work of this constructive factory.

The Sheriff finds that the work in which Dickson was engaged was unshackling the ship's cable in order to turn it end for end. He also finds that Dickson was employed in the work "of repair."

I find no difficulty in holding that the operation of unshackling the cable with a view to turn it end for end was a work of "repair." I see no reason to limit the meaning of repair to the supply or mending of something broken. We are told, it is true, by the Sheriff that unshackling the ship's cable is an operation which may take place in emergencies at sea, and that if done at sea such repair would be part of the proper work of the ship's carpenter. The Sheriff has found, however, that he was engaged in "the repair" of the ship, and, that being so, I think no distinction can be drawn between this case and that of Raine v. Jobson,[1] and that it is governed by that decision.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—Comparing the case of Raine v. Jobson,[1] with the more recent authority cited, The Houlder Line, Limited, v. Griffin,[2] but which has not yet appeared in the official reports, it is quite plain that the Supreme Court of Appeal has kept clearly in view the distinction between the case where the dock is hired by the shipowner for the purposes of repairing a ship, and the case where a ship is being repaired while lying in the water-space of the dock, and surrounded by the structure of a dock which is under the administration of a company or public body.

In the present case the dock was at the exclusive disposal of the shipowners, by whom it had been hired, and the repairs were being executed by workmen employed by them. One of these was a ship's carpenter who had been employed on the vessel during the previous voyage, but who at the time when he met with the accident was not engaged as a seaman but as a workman employed to execute repairs.

The fact that the particular operation on which he was engaged—viz., turning the ship's cable end for end—was such work as a ship's carpenter might be required to do at sea under his contract as a seaman, cannot be held to exclude him from the benefit of the Act unless the mere fact of his being a seaman is sufficient to debar him even although he may happen to be employed at the time as a landsman under a contract of a different description.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships that it is quite clear that the dock in this case was constructively a factory.

It is not disputed that the deceased was employed in this factory, but it is said that the operation in which he was actually engaged was not work concerned with the business of the factory. The Sheriff states, however, that as matter of fact he was employed in the work of repair, which is the very business of this so-called factory, for the work of this factory is the repair of the ship.

If so, the only point is that the deceased was doing work which he might have been required to do while at sea, and in an emergency, but the mere fact that he might on some other occasion have to do elsewhere in a different capacity—that of a seaman—the work which he was doing when the accident happened to him in the capacity of a workman employed by the undertakers cannot be held to exclude him from the provisions of the Act.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Ayrshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,* before the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr (Shairp), Mrs Jane Brown or Davidson, widow of William Davidson, carter, Rankinston, Ayrshire, claimed compensation from the Coylton Coal Company, carrying on business at Littlemill, Rankinston, and James Morton, coalmaster there, the only known partner of that company.

The Sheriff-substitute having awarded compensation, the defenders in the arbitration appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated as follows:—

"I found the following facts admitted or proved:—That the said Jane Brown or Davidson is the widow of the said William Davidson; that he died on the 28th day of November 1903; that on the previous day, when he met with the accident after mentioned, he was in the employment of the said Coylton Coal Company as a carter at their said pit (i.e., their pit at Littlemill, Rankinston, Ayrshire), . . . that his death resulted from the personal injury caused to him, on or about 27th November 1903, when he was knocked to the ground by a beam of timber while he, in the course of his said employment, and acting under the instructions of the defenders, was unloading timber on to the said Coylton Coal Company's cart from a railway waggon standing in a lye belonging to and in the occupation of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, at the point marked with a red cross on the plans Nos. 5 and 6 of process; that the said lye was in the proximity of and about a quarter of a mile from the said Coylton Coal Company's No. 1 pit,

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), enacts, sec. 1, subsec. (1),—"If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act." Sec. 7, subsec. 1,—"This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about," inter alia, a "mine." Subsec. (2), "In this Act . . . 'mine' means," inter alia, "a mine to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 . . . applies." The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58) by sec. 75 declares that "mine" includes "all the shafts, levels, planes, works, tramways, and sidings both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to and belonging to the mine."

and that entry to said lye from the highway was obtained through the railway company's gate, as shewn in said plans; that, although it was not proved that the said Coylton Coal Company had any special arrangement with the railway company in regard to said lye, all the said Coylton Coal Company's carting to and from said pit, except 'two or three carts that went up to the householders in the Rows,' was done to said lye, along the coal company's private road, and the exit of that road on to the highway was opposite the entrance to said lye, as shewn in said plans. . . .*

"Upon these admitted or proved facts, and having in view the opinion expressed by Lord President Robertson in the case of Bell & Sime, Limited, v. Whitton, 16th June 1899, 1 F. 943, I found that the said place where the said William Davidson was, in the course of his said employment, accidentally injured was 'specially connected by use' with the said Coylton Coal Company's No. 1 pit; was 'at no considerable distance' therefrom, and was thus 'about' the said pit, within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that the said Jane Brown or Davidson, the widow and sole dependant of the said William Davidson, was accordingly entitled to compensation from the said Coylton Coal Company, under the said Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. . . ."

The question of law was:—"Whether, in the circumstances stated, the said place where the said William Davidson was, in the course of his said employment, accidentally injured as aforesaid, was 'about' the said Coylton Coal Company's No. 1 pit or mine, within the meaning of section 7 of the said Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"

Argued for the appellants;—The workman here was not injured in the course of employment on or in or about a mine. To satisfy the word 'about,' physical or local contiguity was necessary, and it was not sufficient that the injuries had been sustained while engaged on business connected with the mine, railway, or factory, as the case might be.[1] The rule as to contiguity had been applied where the injuries were sustained by a mine employee on a private line belonging to the mine but at some distance from it.[2] The reason was that the benefits of the Act were confined to premises where dangerous businesses were carried on. The private road here was not part of the mine in the sense of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 75. It was not a "siding," or a "tramway."

* From these plans it appeared that the private road referred to, which led from the pit to the public road, was 259 yards in length from the pit to the gate into the highway, that the railway lye was on the opposite side of the public road from the private road, and that the distance from the gate leading into the lye, opposite to the gate into the private road, to the place where Davidson was injured, was 123 yards.

Coylton Coal Co. v. Davidson.

The "mine," for the purpose of considering the distance, here meant the pit itself. The siding where the accident happened was on the opposite side of a public road from both the pit and the private road. It was owned and occupied by a railway company, not by the mine-owner. The place where the accident occurred was 400 yards from the pit, the distance being made up of railway siding, public road, and private road. There was thus here both discontiguity and too great distance. Further, the accident happened on a railway. This precluded the place being "about" a mine. An accident on one railway, mine, or factory, could not be "about" another,[1] and this applied, however close they might be to one another. The Sheriff-substitute here had proceeded upon a misconception of what the Lord President said in Bell & Sime, Limited, v. Whitton.[2] The Lord President did not mean to say that local contiguity was unnecessary.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The fact that the injuries were sustained when the workman was on a "railway" was not enough to shew that he was not then about a "mine."[3] (2) The private road was part of the "mine."[4] The definition of "mine" was more elastic than the definition of "factory." It was true that "roads" were not mentioned in the definition. But this road was really a siding. The question whether it was part of the "mine" within the definition could not depend upon whether it had rails laid on it or not. It was not essential that a "siding" should have rails on it. The whole of this road was "adjacent" to the pit. In Anderson v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company, Limited,[5] the point on the private railway of the mine where the accident occurred was 800 yards from the pit. [LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—As a Railway Commissioner I know that in railway legislation private railways of mines are called and treated as "sidings" throughout their whole length.] That was the view indicated by Lord Trayner at the argument in Anderson.[5] At any rate the private road was part of the "works" in the sense of the definition, and so part of the mine. The entrance to the railway siding or lye was just opposite to the entrance of the private road. The intervention of a public road made no difference. The place where the accident occurred was therefore "about" the "mine."[6] This was plain if the private road was part of the mine, but even if it was not, the total distance was not so great as to make the place in question not "about" the "mine," taking "mine" here to mean pit. (3) But apart from all this, the true view of the meaning of section 7 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act was that the word "about" referred to the nature of the employment and not to locality. It must be admitted that the opposite view had the support of decisions. But the question had never been properly considered, and should receive reconsideration. It might not be enough that the injured person was employed by the owner of a factory or mine, on factory or mine business, e.g., as a commercial traveller or messenger; but if he was employed not only on factory or mine business but in or about the factory or mine, and was injured in the course of his employment, as the workman here was, then, it was submitted, compensation was due no matter where the injuries were sustained. The spirit in which the Act should be construed was indicated in the case of Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons, Limited.[1] (4) The question here was a question of fact. There was evidence on which the arbitrator was entitled to reach the conclusion he did, and his decision should therefore not be interfered with.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case in regard to the accident for which compensation is claimed are that the deceased man was a carter in the employment of the appellants, that he had taken his cart to a lye of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, there to load wood on to his cart from railway waggons, and that while so engaged a beam of timber struck him, knocked him down, and killed him. The question whether compensation is due depends upon whether, the employment being in connection with the business of a mine, the accident happened "on, or in, or about" a mine, according to the words of the statute. The facts upon which the answer to that question depends are that the deceased had brought his cart along a private road of the appellants for a distance of a quarter of a mile, that then it was taken on to a public road, crossed that road, and entered the premises of the railway company. The stated case refers to the plans lodged, and according to these plans it appears that the length of the private road is 259 yards, that the road is 25 yards wide, and that after crossing the road the cart was taken to a place in the railway company's premises, a distance of 123 yards to the place of the accident.

It can scarcely be disputed that the place of the accident was not "on or in" a mine. It did not belong to, and was not occupied by, the appellants, and they had no control over it, nor any right to interfere in any way with it. It must therefore be under the words "or about" that this claim for compensation must be maintained.

I have considered this case with care, recognising how wide an interpretation has been given in certain decided cases to the words "or about." In one case at least it has been given a wider interpretation than accords with my view of what is reasonable, and in dealing with so vague an expression as "about," the only test is one of reasonableness in the circumstances. I bow to what has been already done, and if I could see that any of the decided cases ruled the present I should not resist their application whatever misgivings I might have as to the propriety of the determination in the previous cases. Apart from decisions, I should myself have no hesitation in holding that in no reasonable sense could the word "about" in the statute be held to apply in the present case, and that the question put by the learned Sheriff must be answered in the negative. The carter had left the mine, and although still on business for the mineowner, was doing the ordinary work of a carter at a place where no dangers connected with a mine were to be encountered. He had not only left the neighbourhood of the mine, but he had left the property of the mineowner, had gone to the other side of the road, and entered a place which belonged to another owner, and which was itself a place to which the Act applied in respect that the owners of that place carried on another dangerous business, for any accident in which the owners were liable to their own employees. How in these circumstances it could possibly be held that he was still at a place which was "about" the mine which he had left I am unable to understand. He would have been a trespasser where he was unless he had gone there on business connected with the railway company, and he could not have said, if asked to state his business or to quit the premises, that he was about his master's mine. His only right to stay could be because his master had business with the railway company. But this might equally apply ten miles off or twenty miles off from his master's premises.

Turning to the decided cases, as I have said already, they have certainly gone very far in holding that places some distance off from the actual mine may be held to be "about" a mine, particularly where they are on or connected with rails running in direct continuation with rails at the mine itself. In one case, where on such a line an accident happened a long distance from the mine, it was held that the words of the Act applied. I expressed my dissent in that case, and have no cause to change my view, but, as I have said, if this case could be held to be similar I would willingly yield to a decision which expressly ruled the case under consideration. But I cannot hold that it is. That was a case where the accident took place on the property of the mineowner, and I know of no other case which goes so far in the direction of holding that a place not in any true proximity to the mine may still be held to be "about" the mine. In this case my view is that in no true sense can the place of the accident be held to be "about" the mine. It happened on premises cut off from the mine by a broad public road, and more than 100 yards within the entrance of the premises of a railway company. It seems to me to be impossible to give such an elastic interpretation to the word "about" as would bring the case within the statute.

I would therefore propose that the question in the case be answered in the negative.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The man who was killed in this case was a workman in the employment of the Coylton Coal Company, and at the time of the accident was engaged in the work of the Company. The question for us is whether the place of the accident was about the Company's mine in the sense of the 7th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It happened on a railway close to a turnpike road, and at a place to which he was in use to cart material to and from the pit, and to which there was access by a gate. Opposite that gate, and on the other side of the road, there was another gate opening on a private road leading to the mine. The road was 259 yards in length. The turnpike road was 25 yards broad, and the distance between the gate opening on the lye and the place where the workman was injured was 123 yards. Thus the distance of the place of accident from the pit was 407 yards, or nearly a quarter of a mile. The case is somewhat narrow, but I am of opinion that the place was not about the mine. It was separated from it by a distance of a quarter of a mile and also by a turnpike road.

No. 131.

Coylton Coal Co. v. Davidson.

None of the dangers incident to a mine could be said to attach to the place of the accident.

The Sheriff-substitute has decided on the ground that the place was connected by use with the pit, but although without such connection it is possible that the statute might not have applied, still it was necessary that the workman should not only be engaged in the course of his employment but also that he should be engaged about his mine. The cases of Fenn v. Miller,[1] Brodie v. North British Railway Company, November 6, 1900,[2] Caton,[3] and Ferguson v. Barclay, Sons, & Company, Limited, November 12, 1902,[4] in which there was but a short distance between the place of the accident and the mine, may be referred to.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—Speaking solely for myself I should have thought, if the question had been open, that there was much force in the argument urged by Mr Campbell to the effect that section 7 of the Act refers not to the locality of the accident but to the kind of employment which is to give a right to compensation. The 1st section has been described by the House of Lords in Lysons'[5] case as "the affirmative or leading enactment," and it declares that "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation." The leading idea of the statute, therefore, is to give compensation to workmen for injury arising out of their employment, even when the employer is entirely free from blame. But inasmuch as the Act was not intended to apply to every kind of employment, it became necessary to define the employment to which it did apply, and I should have thought that the sole purpose of section 7 was to do so. When the section speaks of employment "on or in or about" a railway, factory, mine, quarry, and so on, I should have thought that it introduced the idea of locality only as a means of describing particular trades or occupations, and not in order to restrict the area within which accidents occurring in the course of these particular trades were to give rise to a right of compensation. Such a construction of the statute would undoubtedly have enlarged its scope, but it would at least have avoided the obvious anomaly of allowing compensatien for injury when sustained by a workman at one part of a job and refusing it when sustained at another part although the whole job was ordered by his employer, and the employer was equally free from blame throughout. Why so much importance should have been attached to the locus of the accident itself I do not know, for a workman is just as much in his master's employment, acting in the course of that employment, when he is loading goods for him at a distance from his master's premises as when he is delivering the goods at his master's door.

But I am convinced that it is now too late to go back on the series of cases both here and in England where the words "on or in or about" in section 7 have been read as referring to the workman's actual presence at the time of the accident, and so reading the section I must concur with your Lordships in answering the question of law in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative; sustained the appeal; recalled the award of the arbitrator; and remitted to him to dismiss the claim.

Process—Multiplepoinding—Competency—Double Distress.—Where a testator left legacies to various persons, and a question arose as to the construction of one of these bequests, the trustees, before making payment of certain of the legacies as to which there was no dispute, raised an action of multiplepoinding for distribution of the balance in their hands and for exoneration. Held that the action was incompetent in so far as it submitted for adjudication the legacies other than the one in dispute.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth Darling.

MRS ISABELLA GOLLAN OR MACGILLIVRAY, who died on 26th May 1903, left a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to Alexander Fowler Steele, Inverness, and another as trustees. By the second purpose of her settlement the testatrix directed her trustees to pay a number of special legacies, including, inter alia, a sum of £400 to Mrs MacGillivray or Cameron, a sum of £300 to Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas, and a sum of £300 to Miss Catherine Gollan. By the eighth purpose she bequeathed certain sums to certain schemes of the Free Church of Scotland. By the ninth purpose she directed her trustees to pay the residue of her estate to the said Mrs Mary MacGillivray or Cameron, and declared that "in the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser, equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser."

Mrs Mary MacGillivray or Cameron and Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas predeceased the testatrix, and were both survived by children. Catherine Gollan also predeceased the testatrix, unmarried. She left a will by which she nominated an executor, and she was survived by a brother and sister as well as by certain nephews and nieces.

A question having arisen in connection with the legacy to Catherine Gollan as to the persons to whom, under the direction in the ninth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, the said legacy fell to be paid, the trustees submitted a memorial for the opinion of counsel. Counsel advised that the persons entitled to payment of that legacy were the persons nearest in kin to the said Catherine Gollan at the date of her death, but suggested that in the circumstances the trustees should raise a multiplepoinding. The opinion of counsel further explained the following:—"In this action they should call the whole of Miss Gollan's brothers and sisters and their representatives, and also . . . other persons interested in the residue of the trust-estate in case it might be suggested that the legacy has lapsed."

The trustees thereupon brought an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration, in which the fund in medio consisted of the whole estate of the testatrix in their hands at the date of the action.

Prior to the date of the action the trustees had paid the legacies to those legatees who survived the testatrix, but the legacies bequeathed to persons who had predeceased the testatrix were included in the fund in medio.

Defences were lodged by Duncan Forbes Dallas and others, the children of Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas.

The trustees averred that, in view of counsel's suggestion as to the possibility of it being maintained that lapse had occurred in the case of legacies bequeathed to persons who had predeceased the testatrix, they came to the conclusion that they were not in safety to pay said legacies, including the residue, without judicial sanction or a sufficient discharge otherwise, and intimated to the persons claiming as the representatives of such predeceasing persons that payment of said legacies could not be made as arranged; that with the view of avoiding an action of multiplepoinding, they had endeavoured to obtain a discharge from the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix, who would be entitled to the residue of the estate in the event of it being held that legacies to predeceasing beneficiaries had lapsed; and that the defenders, who were included among the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix, refused to concur in giving such a discharge, even with regard to the legacy of £300 to Mrs Dallas.

The defenders averred that the legacy of £300 to Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas was improperly included in the fund in medio, there being no claimants on said sum other than the defenders. They stated,—"It has never been suggested by the pursuers or by anybody that the defenders are not the parties entitled to said legacy, and no other parties make any pretence to claim said legacy."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is unnecessary. (4) In any event, the action is incompetent, and should be dismissed quoad the said legacy.

On 15th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences for the defenders Duncan Forbes Dallas and others; finding the pursuers and real raisers liable only in once and single payment of the fund in medio; appointing all persons claiming an interest in the said fund to lodge condescendences and claims in ten days; and finding the said defenders liable in expenses in connection with the lodging of the said defences.*

* "OPINION.—Questions as to the competency of actions of multiplepoinding are questions of process, and although they have in the past given rise to much ingenious discussion, they are not generally questions involving any very substantial interests as between the parties. I cannot say that this case is any exception to the rule.

"Now, the competency is here challenged on the ground that there is no double distress. . . .

"Now, the testatrix whose will is in question provided by the ninth

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The legacy bequeathed to Mrs Dallas was clearly due to the reclaimers, her children, under the clause of conditional institution in the ninth purpose of the trust-disposition, and the trustees were bound to pay it. No competition was suggested which could render a multiplepoinding competent quoad this legacy.[1] The inclusion of this legacy in the multiplepoinding was wholly unwarranted, and was not justified by the opinion of counsel, which was obtained with reference to, and was limited to, the legacy to Catherine Gollan. All that the trustees were entitled to, by way of discharge from the reclaimers, was a receipt and discharge for payment of the legacy due to them.[2]

Argued for the pursuers and real raisers;—The action was competent, for, even if there was no double distress quoad this particular legacy, the trustees were entitled to bring the action for their own exoneration and discharge. The trustees acted on the opinion of counsel, purpose of her settlement, that 'in the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser.'

"I do not require to consider at this stage whether there is any ambiguity lurking under these words. It is enough that counsel, when the trustees consulted him, advised that questions might be raised as to the meaning of the clause which I have read—in other words, as to whether the clause prevented a lapse, and, if it did prevent a lapse, who were the persons brought in by the clause. He gave this advice at a time when the trustees had paid a number of legacies about which there was no question, but when there were still certain legacies claimed by the representatives of predeceasing legatees. The important thing about the clause is that it plainly applies equally to the legacies in that position and to the residue; and when the trustees received this advice they, properly enough, set about inquiring who the next of kin of the testatrix were, in case any question might be raised as to the legacies and the residue having lapsed. Then arose the claim by the representatives of one of the predeceasing legatees to a small legacy, they being the children of the legatee. Nobody up to that point had suggested any doubt as to their right, but the trustees, having received the advice which I have mentioned, pointed out to the claimants that there might be a question, and that, if it were raised, the same question would apply to the residue; and (not unreasonably, I think) they stipulated that, if they paid the legacy without judicial authority, they should obtain from the claimants—who were also, as it happened, in the class of next of kin of the testatrix—some kind of assurance that they would not raise the question of lapse with regard to the residue. I confess I should have thought that this demand would have been assented to, because the same clause of conditional institution regulated both legacies and residue, and persons who were claiming a legacy on the ground that there was no lapse could not consistently claim residue on the ground that there was a lapse. However, the claimants of the legacy declined to give the assurance which was demanded—an assurance which was put in the form of a demand for a discharge in particular terms. I do not enter into the question as to whether these terms were the best that could have been devised, because no question and, in view of that opinion and the possible difficulties arising from the lapse of bequests to predeceasing legatees, they were entitled for their own protection to the general discharge which they had asked from the reclaimers, who, as being among the next of kin of the testatrix, might claim lapsed bequests. The refusal by the reclaimers to grant such a discharge justified the trustees in bringing this multiplepoinding. The multiplepoinding was required for their exoneration, and its competency depended, not upon double distress, but upon the right to exoneration.[1] Further, there were here difficulties in the construction of the trust-deed, in particular with reference to (a) the bequests to the Free Church of Scotland, which might be claimed by two Churches, and (b) whether the clause of conditional institution in the ninth purpose applied to residue as well as to legacies.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, finding the pursuers and real raisers of a multiplepoinding liable only in once and single payment of the fund in medio, and appointing parties to lodge claims. The contention is that the multiplepoinding is incompetent.

The criteria on which the competency of a multiplepoinding depends are, I think, very well stated in brief form by both Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear, in the case of Commercial Bank of Scotland v. Muir.[1] Lord M'Laren there, at p. 221, says:—"The determination of the competency of a multiplepoinding is not quite so simple a matter as might appear from the numerous cases in which no dispute as to the competency is raised, but there must at least be a fund in neutral custody, a dispute as to the persons entitled to the fund and competing claims made to it, and in general a demand on the holder by one or more of the disputants." His Lordship goes on to point out that the degree of strictness with which these requisites have to be complied with necessarily varies according to the particular circumstances. Lord Kinnear in the same case (at p. 222) says:—"It comes to this, that we must see that the claims which are said to be competing are not mere random claims, but are real and intelligible claims upon was raised as to the terms of the discharge. The demand was met by a blank refusal, and it is on this refusal that the real raisers of the multiplepoinding in Article 6 of their condescendence found as creating double distress.

"The question therefore comes to be a very narrow one—whether the refusal on the part of the very persons who now say that there is no double distress to give an assurance that they will not claim the residue on the footing of lapse is equivalent to double distress. I cannot say that it is not. The existence of double distress does not require anything of the nature of a formal demand. It is enough, I think, when an action of multiplepoinding is proposed by trustees, that beneficiaries refuse to say whether they are to raise a substantial question or not. If, therefore, the action of the defenders here amounts to that—and I think it does amount to that—it seems to me that the plea of the trustees is a good one, and that the defence of incompetency fails. . . ."

a fund in medio set forth upon grounds which may or may not be well founded in law, but which are at least stated with sufficient precision to shew that there is in truth a double claim upon one fund maintained by persons having hostile interests." I am entirely satisfied with these distinctions as general rules, and I proceed to apply them to this case.

The matter arose out of the will of a Mrs MacGillivray. So far as is material for the present purpose, it is enough to say that in the second purpose of her trust-disposition and settlement she left a set of legacies, and, inter alia, a legacy of £300 to a Mrs Dallas, whose representatives are the reclaimers. Mrs Dallas predeceased the testatrix, and, therefore, in accordance with the ordinary rule, if nothing more had been said, the legacies would have lapsed. But by the ninth purpose of her trust-disposition the testatrix provided as follows:—"In the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser."

Under this provision it was clear that if any particular legacies could not be paid because of the death of the legatee, there was substituted for the original legatee his or her children, if the legatee left children; and, failing children, the executors or next of kin of the legatee. Nobody ever seems to have thought that any other result was possible when a question arose with regard to a legacy left to a certain Catherine Gollan. Catherine Gollan predeceased the testator without children. Accordingly, the question arose as to who were her "executors or next of kin." She had left a testament, under which she had nominated an executor. She had been survived by a brother and sister, as well as by certain nephews and nieces. The question thus arose whether, under the substitution of executors and next of kin in the ninth purpose, the persons who were entitled to Catherine Gollan's legacy were her executor-nominate or her brother and sister, who were the next of kin as at her death, or whether the Intestate Moveable Succession Act came in, so that the nephews and nieces were entitled to participate. These matters having been mooted, the trustees under Mrs MacGillivray's settlement took an opinion of counsel. Counsel advised that the words "executors or next of kin" designated the class of persons who were nearest in kin to Miss Gollan at the date of her death, to wit, her brother and sister. He indicated, however, that this construction of "executors or next of kin" might not be accepted, and that—in order to exclude the possible claims of the nephews and nieces, who, on another construction of these words, would be entitled to participate—the trustees should raise a multiplepoinding. Then he added,—"To this action they should call the whole of Miss Gollan's brothers and sisters and their representatives and also . . . other persons interested in the residue of the trust-estate in case it might be suggested that the legacy has lapsed." Now, nobody had suggested that, and counsel himself did not suggest that it was likely. But the suggestion caused the trustees disquietude, and seeing that it would apply to other legacies as well as that to Miss Gollan, the trustees intimated that they could not pay the legacy to the children of Mrs Dallas.

The facts, therefore, were that here was a special legacy, which on the face of the settlement it was absolutely clear was given to the children of the deceased Mrs Dallas, and nobody had ever said anything to the contrary. Applying the tests your Lordships have laid down, it is quite out of the question that people are to be entitled to cause all the expense of a multiplepoinding just because at the end of a counsel's opinion on the question of discharge he put a suggestion that possibly it might be suggested that some other persons might have a right.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that when this multiplepoinding was raised, there was no ground for having a multiplepoinding in which all these legacies were included. The multiplepoinding which counsel really contemplated was one concerned only with Miss Gollan's legacy.

In ordinary circumstances the result of that view would be to dismiss the action, but then I think that certain circumstances have arisen since the multiplepoinding was brought which do shew that there is room for a multiplepoinding, though not exactly this multiplepoinding. That being so, your Lordships will be very unwilling to cause additional expense if that can be avoided.

The doubts that have arisen are these:—(1) There is a legacy to the Free Church. At the time the multiplepoinding was raised there could be no question as to who were the Free Church, because the judgment of the Court of Session had not then been reversed by the House of Lords. But it is common knowledge that after the reversal in the House of Lords there are two bodies that might claim the legacy. (2) There is another matter, which raises a question which might probably be argued. In the clause I have read there is a provision substituting the children or executors and next of kin of predeceasing persons as the only persons to whom legacies may be paid. I can conceive that a question may be raised as to whether that provision applies to the residue itself.

Both these questions seem to me to be questions which the trustees are entitled to raise in a multiplepoinding, and therefore I should not wish to turn this action out of Court. I would therefore propose that your Lordships should find that the action is incompetent in so far as it deals with this particular legacy, but, instead of the action being dismissed, that it should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to see that the pursuer and real raiser should have an opportunity of amending his condescendence of the fund in medio, and thereafter proceeding with the action.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I only add a sentence upon the point of the criterion of double distress in a multiplepoinding. It might at first sight appear hard on trustees that they should be put into the position of having to administer an estate where there is a doubt as to the persons entitled to it, but where the parties have not put forward competing claims. In such a case it seems to me the duty of the trustees would be, if they are advised by counsel as to which of the parties has the better right, that they should communicate with the other party, and ask that other party whether he wishes that his legacy should be made the subject of an action—whether he makes a claim to it or not. If he says he makes no claim to it then they are in safety to pay in accordance with the opinion they have got. If he says that he does make a claim, and that they pay it to the other party at their peril, then I do not think there could be much doubt, if the sum were a substantial sum, that the trustees would be justified in taking the case into Court.

MacGillivray's Trustees v. Dallas.

In this particular case I agree with your Lordship there are questions—though not questions agitated when the multiplepoinding was raised—that make it desirable that the rights of parties in this estate should be the subject of judicial determination.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: "Find that the action is incompetent in so far as it submits for adjudication the special legacies mentioned in article 3 of the condescendence, other than that to Miss Catherine Gollan, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in accordance with this interlocutor, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses . . ."

"Anglia" and the s.s. "Olga" resulted in the sinking of the "Anglia" and in the "Olga" being slightly damaged. In cross actions of damages between the owners of the "Anglia" and the owners of the "Olga," both vessels were found to be in fault, and the owners of the "Anglia" obtained decree against the owners of the "Olga" for £7149, 14s. 7d., being one-half of the value of the "Anglia" under deduction of one-half of the damage to the "Olga."

The owners of the "Olga" then presented a petition under sections 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for limitation of their liability to £6215, 4s., being £8 per ton on a tonnage of 776·90, the tonnage of the "Olga."

The owners of the "Anglia" lodged a claim in the petition claiming to be ranked on the sum of £6215, 4s. for £7149, 4s. 7d., the sum in the decree obtained by them in the cross actions of damages.

The owners of the cargo of the "Anglia" also lodged a claim in which besides claiming to be ranked in respect of the value of the cargo, they maintained that the decree for £7149, 4s. 7d. was not binding on them; that the value of the "Anglia," on the basis of which that decree was

The cargo owners of the "Anglia" did not aver that the decree for £7149, 4s. 7d. had been obtained collusively or of consent or by way of compromise.

Schedule VI. provides that every such space shall be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under the Act, who is empowered to grant a certificate, and "if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage."

An Order in Council of 21st November 1895, issued under section 84 of the Act, decrees "that the merchant ships of the kingdom of Denmark, the measurement whereof shall . . . have been ascertained and denoted in the certificates of registry or other national papers of such ships, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship."

Held (following The "Franconia," 1878, L. R., 3 P. D. 164, Lord M'Laren concurring solely in deference to that decision) that the owners of a Danish vessel with a Danish certificate setting forth her measurements, including the tonnage taken up by crew space, were not entitled, in ascertaining the tonnage of the vessel for the purposes of section 503 of the Act, to deduct the tonnage set forth in the certificate as taken up by crew space, in respect that the space so set forth had not been certified by one of the surveyors under the Act as required by Schedule VI.

The owners of the "Olga" and the owners of the "Anglia" raised cross actions of damages on account of the collision. In these actions, which were conjoined, the Second Division of the Court, on 31st May 1904, affirming an interlocutor of Lord Low, Ordinary, found that the collision resulted from fault on the part of those in charge of both vessels, and granted decree in favour of the owners of the "Anglia" against the owners of the "Olga" for £7149, 14s. 7d., with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from 18th February 1903 until from the pit was 407 yards, or nearly a quarter of a mile. The case is somewhat narrow, but I am of opinion that the place was not about the mine. It was separated from it by a distance of a quarter of a mile and also by a turnpike road.

None of the dangers incident to a mine could be said to attach to the place of the accident.

The Sheriff-substitute has decided on the ground that the place was connected by use with the pit, but although without such connection it is possible that the statute might not have applied, still it was necessary that the workman should not only be engaged in the course of his employment but also that he should be engaged about his mine. The cases of Fenn v. Miller,[1] Brodie v. North British Railway Company, November 6, 1900,[2] Caton,[3] and Ferguson v. Barclay, Sons, & Company, Limited, November 12, 1902,[4] in which there was but a short distance between the place of the accident and the mine, may be referred to.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—Speaking solely for myself I should have thought, if the question had been open, that there was much force in the argument urged by Mr Campbell to the effect that section 7 of the Act refers not to the locality of the accident but to the kind of employment which is to give a right to compensation. The 1st section has been described by the House of Lords in Lysons[5] case as "the affirmative or leading enactment," and it declares that "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation." The leading idea of the statute, therefore, is to give compensation to workmen for injury arising out of their employment, even when the employer is entirely free from blame. But inasmuch as the Act was not intended to apply to every kind of employment, it became necessary to define the employment to which it did apply, and I should have thought that the sole purpose of section 7 was to do so. When the section speaks of employment "on or in or about" a railway, factory, mine, quarry, and so on, I should have thought that it introduced the idea of locality only as a means of describing particular trades or occupations, and not in order to restrict the area within which accidents occurring in the course of these particular trades were to give rise to a right of compensation. Such a construction of the statute would undoubtedly have enlarged its scope, but it would at least have avoided the obvious anomaly of allowing compensation for injury when sustained by a workman at one part of a job and refusing it when sustained at another part although the whole job was ordered by his employer, and the employer was equally free from blame throughout. Why so much importance should have been attached to the locus of the accident itself I do not know, for a workman is just as much in his master's employment, acting in the course of that employment, when he is loading goods for him at a distance from his master's premises as when he is delivering the goods at his master's door.

But I am convinced that it is now too late to go back on the series of cases both here and in England where the words "on or in or about" in section 7 have been read as referring to the workman's actual presence at the time of the accident, and so reading the section I must concur with your Lordships in answering the question of law in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative; sustained the appeal; recalled the award of the arbitrator; and remitted to him to dismiss the claim.

Process—Multiplepoinding—Competency—Double Distress.—Where a testator left legacies to various persons, and a question arose as to the construction of one of these bequests, the trustees, before making payment of certain of the legacies as to which there was no dispute, raised an action of multiplepoinding for distribution of the balance in their hands and for exoneration. Held that the action was incompetent in so far as it submitted for adjudication the legacies other than the one in dispute.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth Darling.

MRS ISABELLA GOLLAN OR MACGILLIVRAY, who died on 26th May 1903, left a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to Alexander Fowler Steele, Inverness, and another as trustees. By the second purpose of her settlement the testatrix directed her trustees to pay a number of special legacies, including, inter alia, a sum of £400 to Mrs MacGillivray or Cameron, a sum of £300 to Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas, and a sum of £300 to Miss Catherine Gollan. By the eighth purpose she bequeathed certain sums to certain schemes of the Free Church of Scotland. By the ninth purpose she directed her trustees to pay the residue of her estate to the said Mrs Mary MacGillivray or Cameron, and declared that "in the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser, equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser."

Mrs Mary MacGillivray or Cameron and Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas predeceased the testatrix, and were both survived by children. Catherine Gollan also predeceased the testatrix, unmarried. She left a will by which she nominated an executor, and she was survived by a brother and sister as well as by certain nephews and nieces.

A question having arisen in connection with the legacy to Catherine Gollan as to the persons to whom, under the direction in the ninth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, the said legacy fell to be paid, the trustees submitted a memorial for the opinion of counsel. Counsel advised that the persons entitled to payment of that legacy were the persons nearest in kin to the said Catherine Gollan at the date of her death, but suggested that in the circumstances the trustees should raise a multiplepoinding. The opinion of counsel further contained the following:—"To this action they should call the whole of Miss Gollan's brothers and sisters and their representatives, and also . . . other persons interested in the residue of the trust-estate, in case it might be suggested that the legacy has lapsed."

The trustees thereupon brought an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration, in which the fund in medio consisted of the whole estate of the testatrix in their hands at the date of the action.

Prior to the date of the action the trustees had paid the legacies to those legatees who survived the testatrix, but the legacies bequeathed to persons who had predeceased the testatrix were included in the fund in medio.

Defences were lodged by Duncan Forbes Dallas and others, the children of Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas.

The trustees averred that, in view of counsel's suggestion as to the possibility of it being maintained that lapse had occurred in the case of legacies bequeathed to persons who had predeceased the testatrix, they came to the conclusion that they were not in safety to pay said legacies, including the residue, without judicial sanction or a sufficient discharge otherwise, and intimated to the persons claiming as the representatives of such predeceasing persons that payment of said legacies could not be made as arranged; that with the view of avoiding an action of multiplepoinding, they had endeavoured to obtain a discharge from the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix, who would be entitled to the residue of the estate in the event of it being held that legacies to predeceasing beneficiaries had lapsed; and that the defenders, who were included among the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix, refused to concur in giving such a discharge, even with regard to the legacy of £300 to Mrs Dallas.

The defenders averred that the legacy of £300 to Mrs Isabella Gollan or Dallas was improperly included in the fund in medio, there being no claimants on said sum other than the defenders. They stated,—"It has never been suggested by the pursuers or by anybody that the defenders are not the parties entitled to said legacy, and no other parties make any pretence to claim said legacy."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is unnecessary. (4) In any event, the action is incompetent, and should be dismissed quoad the said legacy.

On 15th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences for the defenders Duncan Forbes Dallas and others; finding the pursuers and real raisers liable only in once and single payment of the fund in medio; appointing all persons claiming an interest in the said fund to lodge condescendences and claims in ten days; and finding the said defenders liable in expenses in connection with the lodging of the said defences.*

* "OPINION.—Questions as to the competency of actions of multiplepoinding are questions of process, and although they have in the past given rise to much ingenious discussion, they are not generally questions involving any very substantial interests as between the parties. I cannot say that this case is any exception to the rule.

"Now, the competency is here challenged on the ground that there is no double distress. . . .

"Now, the testatrix whose will is in question provided by the ninth

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The legacy bequeathed to Mrs Dallas was clearly due to the reclaimers, her children, under the clause of conditional institution in the ninth purpose of the trust-disposition, and the trustees were bound to pay it. No competition was suggested which could render a multiplepoinding competent quoad this legacy.[1] The inclusion of this legacy in the multiplepoinding was wholly unwarranted, and was not justified by the opinion of counsel, which was obtained with reference to, and was limited to, the legacy to Catherine Gollan. All that the trustees were entitled to, by way of discharge from the reclaimers, was a receipt and discharge for payment of the legacy due to them.[2]

Argued for the pursuers and real raisers;—The action was competent, for, even if there was no double distress quoad this particular legacy, the trustees were entitled to bring the action for their own exoneration and discharge. The trustees acted on the opinion of counsel, purpose of her settlement, that 'in the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser.'

"I do not require to consider at this stage whether there is any ambiguity lurking under these words. It is enough that counsel, when the trustees consulted him, advised that questions might be raised as to the meaning of the clause which I have read—in other words, as to whether the clause prevented a lapse, and, if it did prevent a lapse, who were the persons brought in by the clause. He gave this advice at a time when the trustees had paid a number of legacies about which there was no question, but when there were still certain legacies claimed by the representatives of predeceasing legatees. The important thing about the clause is that it plainly applies equally to the legacies in that position and to the residue; and when the trustees received this advice they, properly enough, set about inquiring who the next of kin of the testatrix were, in case any question might be raised as to the legacies and the residue having lapsed. Then arose the claim by the representatives of one of the predeceasing legatees to a small legacy, they being the children of the legatee. Nobody up to that point had suggested any doubt as to their right, but the trustees, having received the advice which I have mentioned, pointed out to the claimants that there might be a question, and that, if it were raised, the same question would apply to the residue; and (not unreasonably, I think) they stipulated that, if they paid the legacy without judicial authority, they should obtain from the claimants—who were also, as it happened, in the class of next of kin of the testatrix—some kind of assurance that they would not raise the question of lapse with regard to the residue. I confess I should have thought that this demand would have been assented to, because the same clause of conditional institution regulated both legacies and residue, and persons who were claiming a legacy on the ground that there was no lapse could not consistently claim residue on the ground that there was a lapse. However, the claimants of the legacy declined to give the assurance which was demanded—an assurance which was put in the form of a demand for a discharge in particular terms. I do not enter into the question as to whether these terms were the best that could have been devised, because no question and, in view of that opinion and the possible difficulties arising from the lapse of bequests to predeceasing legatees, they were entitled for their own protection to the general discharge which they had asked from the reclaimers, who, as being among the next of kin of the testatrix, might claim lapsed bequests. The refusal by the reclaimers to grant such a discharge justified the trustees in bringing this multiplepoinding. The multiplepoinding was required for their exoneration, and its competency depended, not upon double distress, but upon the right to exoneration.[1] Further, there were here difficulties in the construction of the trust-deed, in particular with reference to (a) the bequests to the Free Church of Scotland, which might be claimed by two Churches, and (b) whether the clause of conditional institution in the ninth purpose applied to residue as well as to legacies.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, finding the pursuers and real raisers of a multiplepoinding liable only in once and single payment of the fund in medio, and appointing parties to lodge claims. The contention is that the multiplepoinding is incompetent.

The criteria on which the competency of a multiplepoinding depends are, I think, very well stated in brief form by both Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear, in the case of Commercial Bank of Scotland v. Muir.[1] Lord M'Laren there, at p. 221, says:—"The determination of the competency of a multiplepoinding is not quite so simple a matter as might appear from the numerous cases in which no dispute as to the competency is raised, but there must at least be a fund in neutral custody, a dispute as to the persons entitled to the fund and competing claims made to it, and in general a demand on the holder by one or more of the disputants." His Lordship goes on to point out that the degree of strictness with which these requisites have to be complied with necessarily varies according to the particular circumstances. Lord Kinnear in the same case (at p. 222) says:—"It comes to this, that we must see that the claims which are said to be competing are not mere random claims, but are real and intelligible claims upon was raised as to the terms of the discharge. The demand was met by a blank refusal, and it is on this refusal that the real raisers of the multiplepoinding in Article 6 of their condescendence found as creating double distress.

"The question therefore comes to be a very narrow one—whether the refusal on the part of the very persons who now say that there is no double distress to give an assurance that they will not claim the residue on the footing of lapse is equivalent to double distress. I cannot say that it is not. The existence of double distress does not require anything of the nature of a formal demand. It is enough, I think, when an action of multiplepoinding is proposed by trustees, that beneficiaries refuse to say whether they are to raise a substantial question or not. If, therefore, the action of the defenders here amounts to that—and I think it does amount to that—it seems to me that the plea of the trustees is a good one, and that the defence of incompetency fails. . . ."

a fund in medio set forth upon grounds which may or may not be well founded in law, but which are at least stated with sufficient precision to shew that there is in truth a double claim upon one fund maintained by persons having hostile interests." I am entirely satisfied with these distinctions as general rules, and I proceed to apply them to this case.

The matter arose out of the will of a Mrs MacGillivray. So far as is material for the present purpose, it is enough to say that in the second purpose of her trust-disposition and settlement she left a set of legacies, and, inter alia, a legacy of £300 to a Mrs Dallas, whose representatives are the reclaimers. Mrs Dallas predeceased the testatrix, and, therefore, in accordance with the ordinary rule, if nothing more had been said, the legacies would have lapsed. But by the ninth purpose of her trust-disposition the testatrix provided as follows:—"In the event of any of the persons to whom legacies are or may be bequeathed by me by these presents, or by any codicil or codicils hereto, deceasing before complete payment of the legacy to which such deceasing person would, if he or she had survived, have been entitled, such legacy shall, so far as not paid to such deceaser, be paid by my trustees to the children of such deceaser equally among them, or failing children, then to the executors or next of kin of such deceaser."

Under this provision it was clear that if any particular legacies could not be paid because of the death of the legatee, there was substituted for the original legatee his or her children, if the legatee left children; and, failing children, the executors or next of kin of the legatee. Nobody ever seems to have thought that any other result was possible when a question arose with regard to a legacy left to a certain Catherine Gollan. Catherine Gollan predeceased the testator without children. Accordingly, the question arose as to who were her "executors or next of kin." She had left a testament, under which she had nominated an executor. She had been survived by a brother and sister, as well as by certain nephews and nieces. The question thus arose whether, under the substitution of executors and next of kin in the ninth purpose, the persons who were entitled to Catherine Gollan's legacy were her executor-nominate or her brother and sister, who were the next of kin as at her death, or whether the Intestate Moveable Succession Act came in, so that the nephews and nieces were entitled to participate. These matters having been mooted, the trustees under Mrs MacGillivray's settlement took an opinion of counsel. Counsel advised that the words "executors or next of kin" designated the class of persons who were nearest in kin to Miss Gollan at the date of her death, to wit, her brother and sister. He indicated, however, that this construction of "executors or next of kin" might not be accepted, and that—in order to exclude the possible claims of the nephews and nieces, who, on another construction of these words, would be entitled to participate—the trustees should raise a multiplepoinding. Then he added,—"To this action they should call the whole of Miss Gollan's brothers and sisters and their representatives and also . . . other persons interested in the residue of the trust-estate in case it might be suggested that the legacy has lapsed." Now, nobody had suggested that, and counsel himself did not suggest that it was likely. But the suggestion caused the trustees disquietude, and seeing that it would apply to other legacies as well as that to Miss Gollan, the trustees intimated that they could not pay the legacy to the children of Mrs Dallas.

The facts, therefore, were that here was a special legacy, which on the face of the settlement it was absolutely clear was given to the children of the deceased Mrs Dallas, and nobody had ever said anything to the contrary. Applying the tests your Lordships have laid down, it is quite out of the question that people are to be entitled to cause all the expense of a multiplepoinding just because at the end of a counsel's opinion on the question of discharge he put a suggestion that possibly it might be suggested that some other persons might have a right.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that when this multiplepoinding was raised, there was no ground for having a multiplepoinding in which all these legacies were included. The multiplepoinding which counsel really contemplated was one concerned only with Miss Gollan's legacy.

In ordinary circumstances the result of that view would be to dismiss the action, but then I think that certain circumstances have arisen since the multiplepoinding was brought which do shew that there is room for a multiplepoinding, though not exactly this multiplepoinding. That being so, your Lordships will be very unwilling to cause additional expense if that can be avoided.

The doubts that have arisen are these:—(1) There is a legacy to the Free Church. At the time the multiplepoinding was raised there could be no question as to who were the Free Church, because the judgment of the Court of Session had not then been reversed by the House of Lords. But it is common knowledge that after the reversal in the House of Lords there are two bodies that might claim the legacy. (2) There is another matter, which raises a question which might probably be argued. In the clause I have read there is a provision substituting the children or executors and next of kin of predeceasing persons as the only persons to whom legacies may be paid. I can conceive that a question may be raised as to whether that provision applies to the residue itself.

Both these questions seem to me to be questions which the trustees are entitled to raise in a multiplepoinding, and therefore I should not wish to turn this action out of Court. I would therefore propose that your Lordships should find that the action is incompetent in so far as it deals with this particular legacy, but, instead of the action being dismissed, that it should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to see that the pursuer and real raiser should have an opportunity of amending his condescendence of the fund in medio, and thereafter proceeding with the action.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I only add a sentence upon the point of the criterion of double distress in a multiplepoinding. It might at first sight appear hard on trustees that they should be put into the position of having to administer an estate where there is a doubt as to the persons entitled to it, but where the parties have not put forward competing claims. In such a case it seems to me the duty of the trustees would be, if they are advised by counsel as to which of the parties has the better right, that they should communicate with the other party, and ask that other party whether he wishes that his legacy should be made the subject of an action—whether he makes a claim to it or not. If he says he makes no claim to it then they are in safety to pay in accordance with the opinion they have got. If he says that he does make a claim, and that they pay it to the other party at their peril, then I do not think there could be much doubt, if the sum were a substantial sum, that the trustees would be justified in taking the case into Court.

In this particular case I agree with your Lordship there are questions—though not questions agitated when the multiplepoinding was raised—that make it desirable that the rights of parties in this estate should be the subject of judicial determination.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: "Find that the action is incompetent in so far as it submits for adjudication the special legacies mentioned in article 3 of the condescendence, other than that to Miss Catherine Gollan, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in accordance with this interlocutor, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses . . ."

In cross actions of damages between the owners of the "Anglia" and the owners of the "Olga," both vessels were found to be in fault, and the owners of the "Anglia" obtained decree against the owners of the "Olga" for £7149, 14s. 7d., being one-half of the value of the "Anglia" under deduction of one-half of the damage to the "Olga."

The owners of the "Olga" then presented a petition under sections 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for limitation of their liability to £6215, 4s., being £8 per ton on a tonnage of 776·90, the tonnage of the "Olga."

reached, was a gross over-estimate of her true value; that the owners of the "Olga" had no interest to contest, and had not in fact contested, the question of the value of the "Anglia," in respect that, once it was decided that both vessels were to blame, the question of exact values became immaterial to the owners of the "Olga," whose limit of £8 per ton was reached by the finding that both vessels were to blame. The cargo owners of the "Anglia" did not aver that the decree for £7149, 4s. 7d. had been obtained collusively or of consent or by way of compromise.

Schedule VI. provides that every such space shall be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under the Act, who is empowered to grant a certificate, and "if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage."

An Order in Council of 21st November 1895, issued under section 84 of the Act, decrees "that the merchant ships of the kingdom of Denmark, the measurement whereof shall . . . have been ascertained and denoted in the certificates of registry or other national papers of such ships, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship."

Held (following The "Franconia," 1878, L. R., 3 P. D. 164, Lord M'Laren concurring solely in deference to that decision) that the owners of a Danish vessel with a Danish certificate setting forth her measurements, including the tonnage taken up by crew space, were not entitled, in ascertaining the tonnage of the vessel for the purposes of section 503 of the Act, to deduct the tonnage set forth in the certificate as taken up by crew space, in respect that the space so set forth had not been certified by one of the surveyors under the Act as required by Schedule VI.

ON 18th February 1903 the s.s. "Olga" of Copenhagen, came into collision with the s.s. "Anglia" of Leith, with the result that the "Anglia" was sunk and the "Olga" sustained damage to her bows. No loss of life or personal injury was caused by the collision.

The owners of the "Olga" and the owners of the "Anglia" raised cross actions of damages on account of the collision. In these actions, which were conjoined, the Second Division of the Court, on 31st May 1904, affirming an interlocutor of Lord Low, Ordinary, found that the collision resulted from fault on the part of those in charge of both vessels, and granted decree in favour of the owners of the "Anglia" against the owners of the "Olga" for £7149, 14s. 7d., with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from 18th February 1903 until parties having or pretending to have any right or claim in the premises to lodge their claims . . . to stop all actions or suits pending, or to be hereafter instituted in this or any other Court, in relation to your petitioners' liability, as owners of said ship 'Olga,' in respect of said collision, and to limit the liability of your petitioners as owners of the said ship 'Olga' in respect of said collision to a sum not exceeding £6215, 4s. sterling, and thereafter to distribute the same rateably among the several claimants, and to discharge your petitioners."

The petitioners set forth the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary and the Court in the conjoined actions of damages, and averred that the gross tonnage of the "Olga" was 776·90. "The petitioners admit liability on account of said collision to the extent indicated in said interlocutors, and they also admit liability for a proportion of the loss of cargo on board the 'Anglia' at the date of the collision, but their liability is, under the 503d section of the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, limited to a sum not exceeding £6215, 4s., being £8 per ton on said 776·90 tons, the gross tonnage of said steamship 'Olga.'"

Claims were lodged (1) by the owners of the "Anglia," and (2) by the owners of the cargo on board the "Anglia."

(1) The owners of the "Anglia" in their claim stated,—"By the interlocutors . . . referred to in the petition, the said claimants obtained decree against the petitioners for the sum of £7149, 14s. 7d., together with interest at 5 per cent per annum from 18th February 1903, conform to extract decree herewith produced. . . .

"The claimants have been authorised by the master and crew to claim on their behalf for the amounts of the losses sustained by them through the sinking of the said s.s. 'Anglia.' The value of the effects lost by the master and crew was £80, 10s. . . .

"The tonnage upon which the liability of the petitioners is to be calculated is correctly stated at 776·90 tons, and the amount payable in respect thereof at £8 per ton is, as stated in the petition, £6215, 4s., but in addition the petitioners are bound to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the 18th February 1903, the date of the collision, until payment or consignation."

The owners of the "Anglia" claimed "(1) To be ranked and preferred on the fund for the said sum of £7149, 14s. 7d., with interest at 5 per cent per annum from 18th February 1903; and (2) to be ranked and preferred on the fund for the said sum of £80, 10s., with interest from 18th February 1903."

The owners of the "Anglia" pleaded;—(1) The petitioners are liable for interest on the sum stated in the petition from the date of

to such regulations as to making persons interested parties to the proceedings, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of any costs, as the Court thinks just."

The "regulations scheduled to this Act" referred to in secs. 79 and 503 are contained in Schedule VI. to the Act, and include "(3) Every place so occupied and appropriated [i.e., occupied by seamen or apprentices] as aforesaid shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under this Act [viz., surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade under section 724], who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of customs a certificate to that effect, and if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage."

the collision till payment or consignation. (2) The claimants having obtained decree for the amount first claimed for are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim. (3) The master and crew of the s.s. "Anglia" having incurred loss to the amount second claimed for, through the fault of those for whom the petitioners are responsible, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

(2) The owners of the cargo of the "Anglia" in their claim stated that the cargo was totally lost through the sinking of the "Anglia." "These claimants have therefore sustained loss and damage to the extent of the sums standing opposite their names respectively in" a schedule annexed to the petition. "The total value of the cargo appearing in the schedule is £4669, 12s. 3d."

The owners of the cargo further stated;—"The sole question between the parties to the conjoined actions referred to in the petition, to which the present claimants were not called, was whether or not the owners of the 'Anglia' were solely to blame. Once it was decided that the 'Olga' was even jointly to blame, the question of exact values became immaterial to the owners of the 'Olga,' whose limit of £8 per ton of liability was reached by the finding of both vessels to blame. The damages resultant on the finding of both to blame were therefore admitted at the full amount claimed by the owners of the 'Anglia' without further evidence or discussion. These claimants are, therefore, not prepared to admit on the information at present before them that the claimants, the owners of the 'Anglia,' are entitled to rank on the fund for the full amount contained in their decree. These claimants believe and aver that the true value of the 'Anglia' was not £14,687 as admitted by the petitioners, but £7000 or thereby; and submit that the claimants, the owners of the 'Anglia,' fall to be ranked on the fund for the sum of £3693, 15s. 6d. or thereby, less the sum of £387, 10s. 10d., being the damage found to have been sustained by the 'Olga' in said collision. These claimants further submit that the collision having been partly caused by the fault of the master and crew of the 'Anglia,' they are not entitled to rank on the fund for the value of their effects; or, at the most, are only entitled to rank for one-half of the value of the same."

The owners of the cargo claimed "to be ranked and preferred on the fund to the extent of one-half of the sums standing opposite their names in the schedule hereto annexed, with interest thereon at five per centum per annum, from the 18th day of February 1903 till payment; or, in the event of claims to a greater extent than the said fund being sustained, then the several claimants should be ranked and preferred to the said fund for the proportion thereof effeiring to their said claims."

The nature of the arguments at the hearing (on 10th January 1905) between the two sets of claimants sufficiently appears from the opinion of Lord Kyllachy.[1]

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—This is a statutory proceeding under the 503d and 504th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. It has been initiated by petition to the Court under the latter section, and in that petition an order for claims was lately pronounced. Claims having been lodged, we had the other day a discussion upon certain questions raised by these claims.

The first question is a very short one, and was hardly, I think, contested. It is whether the petitioners have to add to the fund in medio interest at 4 per cent from the date of the collision. As to that, all I need say is that I see no reason why such interest should not be added. It seems to have been so decided in England in the case of the "Crathie."[1]

The second question is also a very short one. It relates to a claim made by the owners of the "Anglia" on behalf of the master and crew, for the sum of £80, 10s., being the alleged value of effects lost in the collision. I rather understood at the discussion that the objection to this claim was not pressed.

The third question, however, is one which involves a considerable sum of money, and it is desired that we should decide it before making the usual remit. The question is this: The owners of the "Anglia" claim to be ranked for the sum of £7149, 14s. 7d., being the damages found to be due to them by the petitioners—the owners of the "Olga"—in the recent action before the Court, which determined the liability for the collision. In that action the collision was found to have been caused by the fault of both ships, and accordingly the damage to each had to be ascertained and divided. After a proof it was found by a decree in foro that a balance of damages was due to the owners of the "Anglia" and that this balance amounted to the sum I have mentioned. It is said, however, by certain other claimants —the owners of the cargo on board the "Anglia," who were not parties to the former action but have appeared here—that the damage awarded to the "Anglia" in the action referred to was over-estimated; that the owners of the "Olga" had (in view of their limited liability) only a slight interest to contest the amount; and (as I understood the suggestion) that they did not contest it in an adequate manner. In consequence, they (the cargo owners) contend that they are entitled to have the damage in question reassessed in this process, just in the same way as if it had never been constituted. They do not allege that the decree of constitution was obtained collusively, or of consent, or by way of compromise. But they say that for the purposes of the present proceeding all questions are open.

As to this matter, I think we may disregard some arguments with which we were favoured with respect to collision claims involving questions of maritime lien, and enforceable by actions in rem. For, when the present case is examined, it does not appear to involve any such questions. The claims arising from this collision are all of them—so far as appears—personal claims against the owners of the two vessels, and there is no suggestion that anybody has done diligence or taken action in rem, or that anybody is here claiming otherwise than for an ordinary debt. In particular, the only liability with which we are here concerned is the personal liability of the owners of the "Olga" for certain sums of damages—a liability with only this peculiarity, that it is by statute limited to £8 per ton on the gross tonnage of the vessel. This limited liability makes a process of distribution necessary, but so far as I can discover there is no statutory enactment or doctrine of maritime law which introduces into such process of distribution any novel or special rules. It has to be conducted, I apprehend, upon the same principles as we are accustomed to apply in other processes of distribution—some of them very familiar—as, for instance, sequestrations in bankruptcy, rankings and sale, multiplepoindings by executors who allege insolvency, and similar proceedings.

In these circumstances it appears to me to be a quite untenable proposition that the owners of the "Anglia," should be bound at the instance of other creditors to forego the benefit (such as it is) of having had their claim duly constituted (as it has been) against the debtor, by a decree in foro obtained in a competent Court, causa cognita, and upon evidence led, with which the parties to the case and the Judge were satisfied. Such a proposal would be inadmissible in a process of sequestration, and so far as I know in any other process of distribution. It may be that the evidence led by the owners of the "Anglia" was inadequate, or was not sufficiently tested, or that counter evidence might have been led which was not led. But that is a kind of observation which might be made in any case. Of course it would be a different matter if there were averments of collusion, or perhaps even of compromise. But, as I have said, nothing of the kind is suggested, and accordingly it seems to me that the claim of the owners of the "Anglia" must be taken at the amount fixed in the previous process.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent at the hearing.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find (1) that the owners of the 'Olga' are liable in interest at 4 per cent from the date of the collision; (2) that the owners of the 'Anglia' are not bound to try again in this process the amount of the claim against the petitioners, but that the same falls to be taken at the amount judicially determined in the process the owners of the 'Anglia' against the owners of the 'Olga,' et e contra: Find the claimants the owners of the 'Anglia' entitled to expenses as against the claimants the owners of the cargo on board the 'Anglia,' and remit," &c.

Thereafter on 14th February 1905 the petitioners (the owners of the "Olga") lodged a minute, in which they stated "that the tonnage of the steamship 'Olga' is erroneously stated in the petition at 776·90 tons, in respect that the space occupied by seamen and apprentices, amounting to 39·54 tons, has not been deducted from the gross tonnage in terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, section 503 (2) (a)* before bringing out the tonnage on which the petitioners' liability falls to be assessed. The petitioners therefore pray the Court for leave to amend the petition by substituting a tonnage of 737·36, and a corresponding sum of £5898, 17s. 7d. (to which the liability of the petitioners falls to be limited) for the tonnage of 776·90, and the sum of £6215, 4s. stated in the petition."

The claimants, the owners of the "Anglia" and of her cargo, maintained that the petitioners were not entitled to the deduction claimed, in respect that the space on board the "Olga" had not been "certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act" in terms of sec. 503, subsec. (2), of the Act, inasmuch as that space had not been inspected and certified by a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Schedule VI. (3).

The petitioners did not dispute that the space in question had not been so inspected and certified, but they founded on an Order in Council, dated 21st November 1895,* and they produced a Danish certificate of registry and nationality, which bore that the gross tonnage of the "Olga" was 776·90 tons, that her net register tonnage was 470·52 tons, and that included in the deductions bringing out the net register tonnage was space for the accommodation of the crew amounting to 39·54 tons—all British measurement.

The arguments at the hearing sufficiently appear from the opinions of Lord Kyllachy and Lord M'Laren.[1]

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I have, in common with both your Lordships, been disposed to sustain if possible the deduction for which the petitioners the owners of the "Olga" contend. We all, I think, recognise the anomaly which may result if the petitioners' claim to that deduction is refused.

But the question has to be determined not upon grounds of policy but upon the legal construction of certain clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 (sections 77 to 87, and section 503), and as to that statute we find ourselves in this position, that its enactments—or enactments substantially similar contained in previous statutes—have been construed adversely to the claim now made by (1) the Court of Appeal in England in the case of the "Franconia,"[2] and (2) by the present President of the Admiralty Division in the recent case of the "Cathay."[3] The question before us therefore is, whether upon our examination of the statutory enactments we feel compelled to differ from the conclusions and the reasoning of the learned Judges by whom the two cases in question were decided.

Now, speaking for myself, I should in any circumstances have had great diffidence in so differing. For although not binding upon us, the decisions in question must be accepted as decisions of high authority, especially as being decisions upon the construction of a British statute and relating to a subject-matter as to which the laws of the two countries are the same.

As it happens, however, having had the benefit of a full argument, and having examined—I hope carefully—the various sections of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 to which our attention was directed, I have come to the same conclusion as the learned Judges in England, and indeed have come to consider that there is no escape from their reasoning.

The broad view of the matter seems to be this: The 503d section of the statute introduces in favour of shipowners a certain limitation of liability in the case of collision—a limitation which has to be estimated according to tonnage, and which in the case of steamers (the case before us) has to be estimated according to gross tonnage, subject only to a single deduction, viz., the space appropriated to the use of seamen and apprentices, and this single deduction is to be allowed only if and when the space in question has been certified under certain regulations in a schedule annexed to the Act, one of which regulations is this:—"Every place so occupied and appropriated as aforesaid shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under this Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of customs a certificate to that effect, and if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage." Failing compliance with this condition the estimate has to be made on gross tonnage, and that has to be so in case of all steamers, British or foreign, which claim the benefit of the relief conferred by the 503d section of the statute.

Prima facie therefore there seems no escape from the conclusion that the petitioners' steamer (which it is admitted has not had its seamen's accommodation inspected and certified in terms of the statutory condition) is excluded, not from the benefit of the relief afforded by the enactment but from the benefit of the deduction from gross tonnage which is here claimed, and which somewhat enhances the amount of relief.

The suggestion, however, of the petitioners is this: They say that compliance with the condition required is in the case of foreign vessels practically impossible; and that that being so, the exaction of the condition is inconsistent with the provisions of the 84th section of the statute—provisions applicable to vessels belonging to foreign nations whose tonnage regulations have—as is admitted to be the case here—been approved by Order in Council under the said section.

The 84th section is a short one, and is thus expressed—"(1) Whenever it appears to Her Majesty the Queen in Council that the tonnage regulations of this Act have been adopted by any foreign country, and are in force there, Her Majesty in Council may order that the ships of that country shall, without being re-measured in Her Majesty's dominions, be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes as the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of a British ship is deemed to be the tonnage of that ship."

Now, I do see what may be called the anomaly of exacting from foreign vessels compliance with a condition which is to them impossible. I can see that that may possibly be a defect in the Act of Parliament, and may possibly have been the result of oversight. But I do not, I confess, see how the application to foreign ships of the condition in question, whatever its merits, involves any inconsistency with the 84th section of the statute or the Order in Council made under it. For, so far as I can discover, the condition involves no distinction between British and foreign ships with respect to the acceptance for the purposes of the 503d section of either their gross or registered tonnage as appearing in the certificate of registry. The gross tonnage is in both cases accepted (subject to a single deduction). The registered tonnage is in both cases disregarded. The difference, if there be one, is at best only this, that in estimating a tonnage which is something between gross and registered tonnage—viz., the tonnage of the 503d section—there is a condition prescribed which, as it happens, foreign vessels cannot in practice fulfil.

It is no doubt true that compliance with the same condition (the condition as to the surveyor's certificate) is required under the 79th section of the Act before the same deduction (crew space) can be included among the deductions which make up the difference between gross and registered tonnage—deductions which for that purpose are set forth in the certificate of registry. And in view of this circumstance it has been argued (1) that if this were the case of a British steamship, whose certificate of registry set forth and allowed the deduction in question as a deduction affecting registered tonnage, her certificate of registry must have been accepted as conclusive evidence that all statutory conditions had been duly complied with; and (2) that, that being so, the certificate of registry of this Danish ship, setting forth as it does and allowing the same deductions, must, under the 84th section and the Order in Council have the same privilege. But it appears to me that this argument, supposing it to be otherwise sound, is founded upon an assumption which I cannot accept—an assumption which was rejected in the English cases, and in support of which we had really no argument. The assumption is that everything which appears on the register certificate of a British ship is for all purposes, including the special purpose of the 503d section, to be taken as probatio probata and not examinable. I am bound to say that I can find no statutory warrant for such an assumption. In other words, I, as at present advised, see no sufficient ground upon which we could have allowed this deduction although the "Olga" had been a British steamship as to which it was proved that in estimating her register tonnage the deduction made in respect of seamen's accommodation had been improperly made. The certificate of registry may in the case both of British and of Danish ships be prima facie, or perhaps even conclusive, evidence of the register tonnage. That is to say, it may be so in all questions (such as liability for dues, &c.) where register tonnage is the rule. I say nothing upon that question, which is not before us, and which may involve different principles. But supposing that point conceded, it does not, I think, follow that the result must be the same in a case like the present where register tonnage is not the rule, and where the question relates, not to register tonnage, but, as I have already said, to a special tonnage, set up for the purposes of the 503d section—a tonnage intermediate between gross and register tonnage—and which must, as it seems to me, be ascertained just in the manner which the 503d section prescribes.

LORD M'LAREN.—Under the 503d section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which limits the liability of owners for injury to a ship or cargo to £8 per ton, it is provided, subsection (2) (a), that there shall not be included in such tonnage any space occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use, "which is certified under the regulations scheduled to this Act with regard thereto." The schedule referred to is the 6th schedule to the Act, which provides, inter alia, that every place so occupied and appropriated shall be inspected by one of the surveyors of ships under the Act, who is empowered to grant a certificate, and (the schedule proceeds to say) "if the certificate is obtained, but not otherwise, the space shall be deducted from the register tonnage."

The question in this case is whether the owners of the "Olga" are entitled to have the space which is appropriated to seamen and apprentices deducted from her tonnage in estimating their liability under the limitation to £8 per ton. According to the argument of the claimants it is a condition of the right to such deduction that a certificate shall have been obtained from a surveyor of ships under the Merchant Shipping Act; and in the case of a British ship I do not doubt that the right is so conditioned.

But in the case of the "Olga," which is a Danish ship, the right to a deduction for what has been called crew space does not depend on the 503d section and relative schedule alone, but depends on the combined effect of that section and the 84th section, and of an Order in Council dated 21st November 1895, made in pursuance of the 84th section.

The 84th section provides in substance that whenever it shall appear to the Queen in Council that the tonnage regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act have been adopted by any foreign country, an Order in Council may be made to the effect that the ships of that country shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers. Such an Order in Council has been made applicable to Danish ships.

Now, if this question had arisen for decision for the first time, I should have come without doubt or hesitation to the conclusion that what was meant (in the 84th section) by the tonnage regulations of the United Kingdom being adopted by any foreign country was not that the foreign vessels were to be sent to London or Leith to be measured by a British surveyor, or that a British surveyor was to be sent to Copenhagen whenever a Danish ship was to be measured, but that the ships were to be measured in their own country according to the rules of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that the necessary certificates were to be granted by qualified surveyors licensed by the proper authority in the country of the ship's nationality.

Keeping in view that the carrying trade of the United Kingdom is the greatest in the world, and that very great attention has been given by our Parliament and Government to the regulation of merchant shipping, it was not unnatural that we should in a manner invite foreign nations to adopt our tonnage regulations in the only way in which such regulations could be adopted, viz., by equivalent enactments or regulations of the foreign country. But it could not be supposed that English surveyors would be employed for the purpose, and I do not think it is sound construction to say that in the case of a foreign vessel the certificate of an English surveyor is a condition of the right to a deduction for crew space.

But further, I think this question is not left to the decision of courts of law, because the provision of the 84th section is that when it appears to Her Majesty in Council that the tonnage regulations have been adopted, then an order may be made. I think, therefore, that it was for the Privy Council, in the execution of the powers of the 84th section, to consider whether the Danish regulations were equivalent to the British regulations, allowing for necessary geographical and personal variations, and as the Privy Council were satisfied and the Order was made, the Court must assume that the spaces measured and described in the ship's registry are those to which the Merchant Shipping Act applies.

I am, however, much impressed by the inconvenience of having different interpretations of the same enactment in force in different parts of the United Kingdom, and as I understand that the majority of the Court are prepared to adopt the interpretation of the clause which has the support of a judgment of the Court of Appeal in England, I shall not withhold my assent. But in case any similar question should be carried to a higher Court, I should wish it to be understood that I only concur in the judgment proposed out of deference to the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and the practice which has followed upon it.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Kyllachy.

LORD YOUNG and LORD KINCAIRNEY were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse to allow the petitioners to amend the petition as proposed, and find that the sum for which the petitioners are liable in respect of the collision mentioned in the petition is £6215, 4s., with interest at 4 per cent from 18th February 1903: Find the petitioners liable to the claimants in the expenses relating to the discussion on the said minute, as for one appearance, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and to report: Order the petitioners to consign in bank the sum of £6215, 4s., with interest at 4 per cent from 18th February 1903, and on the petitioners consigning said sum with interest, limit the liability in respect of said collision to the sum of £6215, 4s., with interest thereon as aforesaid."

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts — Bequest to Ragged School—Identity of Institution—Change in methods of attaining objects—School sold and funds devoted to providing clothes and books for destitute children.—A bequest was made to a Ragged Industrial School which had been established in 1857 by an association "to rescue" destitute children, "and to fit them for the duties of life by imparting to them a good, common, and Christian education." The members of the society had power to alter the constitution. Originally, and till after the testator's death, the society conducted a school of its own. Owing to the provision of free education it closed and sold its school, and thereafter devoted its funds under an amended constitution to providing destitute children with clothing and books to enable them to attend the board school. Vesting of the legacy was postponed until an event which occurred after these changes had been introduced.

Held that the bequest had not lapsed by failure of the legatee, the institution not having lost its identity, although it had altered its methods of attaining its objects.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

THOMAS JOHNSTON, grocer and wine-merchant in Kelso, died on 26th March 1888, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d February 1888, by which he conveyed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. With regard to the residue of his estate he directed his trustees, on the death of his housekeeper, to whom he gave a liferent, to pay "two-eighth parts thereof to the Kelso Ragged Industrial School" "for the purposes of the said School." The testator provided that the capital residuary provisions in the settlement should "vest at and only upon the decease of the survivor" of himself and his housekeeper, and should "be payable as soon as conveniently may be thereafter."

The testator was survived by his housekeeper. She died on 6th February 1903. Upon her death the residuary legacies became payable. A question then arose as to whether the legacy to the Kelso Ragged Industrial School had not lapsed owing to the object of the bequest having ceased to exist.

The facts which gave rise to this question were as follows:—The Kelso Ragged School was started in 1857 by an association of contributors. In 1859 a constitution and rules were framed, the material portions of which are quoted infra.* Down to 1888, at a date subsequent to the death of the testator, the institution in accordance with its original constitution provided education for destitute children in a school of its own in Kelso, and also till 1888 conducted a refuge or home for such of the girls as had no proper home. It also provided food and clothing for the children attending the school. After free education was introduced the society discontinued the provision of education. On 4th June 1888 the Home or Refuge was closed. On 24th December 1889 the school was finally closed. The school buildings were then sold, and the price was added to the general funds. The society thereafter employed its funds primarily in clothing and secondarily in supplying with books children of the same class as those formerly educated by it during their attendance at school. On 28th January 1890 at a special meeting of the members of the association certain alterations and amendments on the constitution and rules of 1857 were unanimously adopted. The amendments proceeded upon the preamble that "in consequence of the alterations occasioned by the operation of the Education Acts, and the provision of free education, it is expedient that the constitution of the Kelso Ragged Industrial School and the rules relating thereto should in some respects be varied and amended." The material parts of the amendments are quoted infra.* The society's operations under the altered constitution continued to be carried on under the name of the Kelso Ragged Industrial School.

In these circumstances the testator's testamentary trustees, as pursuers and real raisers, brought a multiplepoinding in which the fund

"The branches of ordinary education shall be reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and vocal music; and to the girls also sewing and knitting.

"So soon as the means are adequate, the boys shall be taught some industrial employment, as shoemaking, tailoring, or carpentry; the girls shall also be taught washing and cooking of plain food, and a refuge shall be provided for such of the latter as have no proper homes."

The "ordinary routine of the school" was prescribed, and included, besides the usual subjects the following:—"5. Oral religious instruction in catechism, with occasional repetition of psalms, hymns, prayers, texts, parables."

in medio was the sum of £827, being the amount of two-eighths of the residue of the testamentary estate.

Claims were lodged for (1) the Kelso Ragged Industrial School and the honorary treasurer and honorary secretary of the said school; and (2) Mrs Agnes Johnston or Playfair, wife of James Turnbull Playfair, grocer, Coldstream, and Mrs Margaret Johnston or Dalgleish, widow of James Dalgleish, blacksmith, Coldstream, who were the testator's heirs in mobilibus and next of kin.

The claimants the Kelso Ragged Industrial School alleged that they were the Kelso Ragged Industrial School mentioned in the trust-disposition and settlement, and claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, or, alternatively, that the legacy being a charitable bequest the whole fund in medio should be handed over to the claimants, or to such persons as the Court might appoint, subject to a scheme for its administration approved by the Court.

The claimants the testator's heirs in mobilibus and next of kin claimed the whole fund in medio equally between them.

They pleaded;—1. The bequest by the late Thomas Johnston to Kelso Ragged Industrial School having failed either (1) by the object of the bequest having ceased to exist, or (2) by such object having materially changed in scope and character, the share of residue as bequeathed has fallen into intestacy. 2. The claimants being entitled to the intestate moveable estate of the deceased Thomas Johnston, are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

On 13th January 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties in the Procedure-roll, repels the claim for Mrs Agnes Johnston or Playfair and another, No. 14 of process: Sustains the claim for the Kelso Ragged Industrial School, Kelso, and others, No. 10 of process, and ranks and prefers them on the whole fund in medio in terms of their said claim; and decerns in the preference accordingly." *

* "OPINION.—There is no dispute what the object was which the truster had in view, because there was, at the date when the trust-disposition and settlement was executed, and at the date of the truster's death, an association in Kelso which carried on work there of a charitable and educational character under the name of the Kelso Ragged Industrial School. It is not disputed that that was the association which the truster had in view, and that if the bequest had vested at the date of his death, the association to which I have referred would have been entitled to the legacy. But the legacy did not vest till the death of the liferentrix, an event which occurred in 1903, and the heirs in mobilibus of the truster claim that the legacy has fallen into intestate succession upon the averment that at the latter date the Kelso Ragged Industrial School, which was the object of the truster's bounty, had ceased to exist. If that association had actually ceased to exist, if it had been discontinued and wound up, I should have thought that the claim of the next of kin was well founded, because it seems to me that this was a bequest to a special institution, and that it was no more capable of being used as a general charitable bequest than if it had been a bequest to an individual, so that the question comes to be whether the institution named by the truster is still in existence. Well, there is no doubt that in one sense it is in existence. An association calling itself the Kelso Ragged Industrial School still exists, and it is the same institution which existed when the trust-disposition and settlement was executed, and it has existed from its institution in 1857 down to the present day without any break or interval whatever. But then the claimants say though there

The claimants the testator's heirs in mobilibus and next of kin reclaimed, and argued;—This was a bequest for a particular purpose, not for a charitable purpose generally. The identity of the institution favoured had been lost. The prime object of the charity as originally constituted was religious education, including the catechism, to be given in a school conducted by the Society itself. The school had ceased to exist, and there was no security that the Board School would provide religious education. The Board might discontinue teaching the catechism, or even cease to give any religious education at all. Moreover, the directors under the new constitution were co-opted, and not elected as they were originally. The charity as now conducted was not the institution contemplated in the bequest. The object of the bequest had therefore failed. Where in the case of a bequest to a particular charity, and not generally for charitable purposes, the object of the bequest failed, the legacy lapsed just as in

is an institution which carries on a certain work at Kelso under the same name, the objects and the character of its work have so changed that it is not, and cannot be said to be, the industrial school which the truster intended to favour. That, I think, is the sole question in the case, and it is one which requires a little consideration. The association, as I have said, was first instituted in 1857, and its constitution was framed in 1859. Under that constitution the object of the association is stated to be 'to rescue destitute and morally deserted children from idleness and evil temptations.' That is the object of the association. And then the manner in which that object is proposed to be attained is stated to be 'by imparting to them a good, common, and Christian education, and by training them to habits of order and industry.' Very naturally, and indeed inevitably, in 1857, when that constitution was framed, the main method of carrying out the object of the association was by providing a school in which education could be supplied, and accordingly we find that the greater part of the original constitution and of the rules appended to it deal with this school and with nothing else. But there is specially reserved in the constitution powers to the members of the association in general meeting to alter any article of the constitution. Now, shortly after the truster's death, a political event occurred which very much changed the position of the association, because free elementary education was given to this country, and the directors of the association at once recognised that that made it necessary for them to consider what would be the best means of carrying out the main purpose of the association—namely, 'the rescue of destitute and morally deserted children from idleness and evil temptations.' It was no longer necessary, and therefore was most inexpedient, to spend money in giving them an education which the State was providing, and so a general meeting of the association was called, and they amended the constitution of the association, as they were entitled to do, in order to meet the changed circumstances. The alteration which they made was this—that instead of providing the school which the State now provided, they determined to expend the means at their disposal in providing clothing to enable children of the character referred to in the deed of constitution to attend the Board School or other place of education in decency and comfort, and then, if there should be sufficient funds over, to provide them with food and also with books required for their education. It seems to me that that was a diversion of the funds of the institution entirely in accordance with the original purposes of the trust, and although it was not carrying on its main purpose precisely in the way contemplated or which was appropriate at the time of the original institution, it was as nearly as possible on the same lines, because, although it was no longer necessary to provide education, what was done was to enable the children to profit from the education supplied by the case of a legacy to an individual.[1] In such a case the doctrine of cy près did not apply. The case of Marsh v. Attorney-General,[2] cited for the respondents, was a case of an institution merely chosen as the channel for a charitable purpose.[3] This case was not within that class, but within the rules laid down in Clark v. Taylor.[4]

Argued for the claimants and respondents the Kelso Ragged Industrial School;—The identity of the institution had not been lost. There had merely been a modification in the constitution and purposes, which was not beyond the powers of the Society, and was carried out in the way provided by the original constitution. This was a bequest to an institution which had power to alter its constitution. It could not lose its identity by duly exercising that power.[5] It might not be able to change its objects, but it could vary the means of attaining its objects. The limits of its powers were the same as the discretionary powers of the Court in such matters.[6] This institution had not altered its objects, but, at most, merely its methods of attaining its objects. No object had been taken up which had not been originally contemplated, and no object originally contemplated had been abandoned. The provision of food and clothing was one of the original purposes. The object of the Society was not a school, but the rescue of destitute children by means of education. That object was originally only attainable by conducting a school. Now, it was more suitably attained by enabling poor children to attend school under such conditions as to be able to benefit from the education provided free by the public. The directors although no longer elected were liable to be superseded by the association. There was no case in which a bequest had been held to have failed where, as here, the institution still existed, and was attaining its objects, with only some change in its methods. The respondents referred to Marsh v. Attorney-General.[2]

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am quite satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's judgment. He puts the decision, I think, upon the right ground when he says that this is not a bequest generally for charitable purposes, but a bequest to a particular institution, the only question really being whether, since the date of the will this institution has lost its identity by reason of certain changes that have occurred. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the

the State by giving them clothing to enable them to attend school in decency, by supplying them with books, and, if necessary, giving them food. I therefore think that in a very plain sense the object of the testator's bounty is still in existence, and that the Kelso Ragged Industrial School is still carrying on the work. I shall therefore repel the claim of Mr Constable's clients, and sustain the claim of the Kelso Ragged Industrial School."

question must be answered in the negative. The constitution is the same, and the objects are the same. These conditions were fenced with an irritant and a resolutive clause. The original vassal A died infeft in 1842, and the lands remained in non-entry until 1903, when his heirs were impliedly entered by recording in the Register of Sasines an extract of a decree pronounced in their favour by the Sheriff of Chancery, but they did not pay a casualty. In the same year they disponed part of the subjects to B, a purchaser, who was impliedly entered by recording the disposition in his favour.

In an action against B by the superior for declarator and payment of the casualty, raised in the statutory form provided by the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the defender pleaded that the action was incompetent in this form, and that the only action that could be competently raised against him was an ordinary petitory action founded on the contractual obligations in the feu-charter. The Court held that, as there was no vassal in life who had paid a casualty on entry, and as by the law prior to 1874 a declarator of non-entry could, in these circumstances, have been brought, the present action, as the statutory equivalent of a declarator of non-entry, was competent.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

THIS was an action of declarator and for payment of a casualty, brought, in the form provided in Schedule B annexed to the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act of 1874, by the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs John Christie, as the superiors of a shop and pertinents No. 7 Spittal Street, Edinburgh, against Patrick M'Dougall, the proprietor of the said shop.

The action was raised in the following circumstances:—

No. 135.

June 8, 1905.
Christie's Trustees v. M'Dougall.

By feu-charter, dated 29th April 1835, James Bridges, clerk to and on behalf of the Commissioners acting under certain Acts of Parliament, feued to David Callum, a builder in Edinburgh, an area of ground in Spittal Street and Bread Street, Edinburgh, and Callum took infeftment in the same by instrument of sasine in his favour, dated and recorded in the same year.

By the terms of the feu-charter subinfeudation was prohibited, and by the reddendo clause a casualty of double the feu-duty became payable the first year of the entry of each heir or singular successor. These conditions were fenced by an irritant and a resolutive clause.

Callum erected a tenement of shops and houses on the ground feued to him. He died in or before October 1842, but during his lifetime he had sold all the premises erected by him, with the exception of four shops and two half flats, of which he remained the proprietor at the time of his death.

Callum's estates had been sequestrated in 1838, and a trustee appointed, in whose favour he executed a disposition of the four shops and two half flats, but the trustee never took infeftment in these subjects, the feudal title to which still remained in Callum. In the following year a heritable creditor of Callum entered into possession of these subjects, and he and his successors continued in possession of them as heritable creditors until December 1902.

By decree of the Court of Session, dated 3d March 1903, the sequestration of David Callum was declared at an end, and on 18th June 1903 Miss Christina Callum and Miss Elizabeth Callum (who were then his heirs) obtained a decree from the Sheriff of Chancery finding that they were entitled to procure themselves infeft in the dominium utile of the four shops and two half flats, and they proceeded to make up their title thereto by recording an extract of this decree in the Register of Sasines on 4th August 1903, and thus became impliedly entered in the subjects in virtue of the 4th section of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.* They paid no casualty to the superior.

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), by section 4, subsection (1), abolishes renewal of investiture, and by subsection (2) enacts that "every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate Register of Sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior . . . to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice." By subsection (3) it enacts that "such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry; and all rights and remedies competent to a superior under the existing law and practice, or under the conditions of any feu-right for recovering, securing, and making effectual such casualties, feu-duties, and arrears, or for irritating the feu ob non solutum canonem, and all the obligations and conditions in the feu-rights prestable to or exigible by the superior, in so far as the same may not have ceased to be operative in consequence of the provisions of this Act or otherwise, shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming; but provided always, that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his Christie's Trustees v. M'Dougall.

On the 9th November 1903 the Misses Callum disponed to Patrick M'Dougall, the present defender, the shop No. 7 Spittal Street, being a portion of the four shops and two half flats of which they had become the proprietors. M'Dougall recorded this disposition in the Register of Sasines.

On 26th February 1904 the pursuers, Christie's trustees, who were then the superiors of the four shops and two half flats, raised this action against Patrick M'Dougall in which they sought to have it found and declared that in consequence of the death of David Callum, the vassal last vest and seised in the said shop, No. 7 Spittal Street, a casualty of £50, 4s. became due to the pursuers and is still unpaid, and that the full rents, maills, and duties of the said shop do belong to the pursuers until the said casualty and expenses be paid; and they also asked that the defender be decerned to make payment to them of the said sum of £50, 4s., being the casualty foresaid. The summons, as before mentioned, was in the form provided in Schedule B annexed to the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 9) "The said four shops and two half flats and others held by the said David Callum fell into non-entry by his death, and in consequence thereof a taxed composition or casualty of £50, 4s., being a duplicand of the feu-duty of £25, 2s. over and above the feu-duty for the year affecting the said subjects, became due and exigible by the superiors, but no composition or casualty has been paid to the superiors in respect of the death of the said David Callum as regards said four shops and two half flats and others."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender having refused to pay to the pursuers the taxed composition or casualty of £50, 4s. referred to in the summons, the pursuers are entitled to declarator and decree for payment as concluded for, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—The action is irrelevant.

On 8th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares that in consequence of the death of David Callum, wright and builder in Edinburgh, who was the vassal last vest and seised in All and Whole the shop No. 7 Spittal Street, Edinburgh, consisting of front shop, two apartments, and conveniences, with the cellars under the same, and also the coal cellar under the shop, all as particularly described in the summons, a casualty of £50, 4s. became due to the pursuers, as superiors of the said subjects, and is still unpaid, and that the full rents, maills, and duties of the said shop No. 7 Spittal Street and others after the date of this interlocutor do belong to the pursuers, as superiors foresaid, until the said casualty and the expenses after mentioned be otherwise paid to the pursuers; and decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £50, 4s., being the casualty foresaid," &c. entering." And by subsection (4) it enacts that "no lands shall, after the commencement of this Act, be deemed to be in non-entry, but a superior who would but for this Act be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance, may raise in the Court of Session against such successor, whether he shall be infeft or not, an action of declarator and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action . . . and the summons in such action may be in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule B hereto annexed."

No. 135.
June 8, 1905.
Christie's Trustees v. M'Dougall.

The defender reclaimed, and in addition to the pleas argued before the Lord Ordinary he advanced two new contentions which had not been maintained in the Outer-House. It is with the first of these, namely, that the action in its present form was incompetent, that this report alone deals. On that point the defender argued;—This was the statutory equivalent for an action of non-entry, and there being a vassal entered here (i.e., the Misses Callum) an action of non-entry could not have been brought. The only action competent here was an ordinary petitory action based on the contractual obligations contained in the feu-charter.[1]

On that point the pursuers argued;—The last vassal who had paid a casualty was dead. By the law prior to 1874 the superior would have had the remedy of an action of non-entry, for which this action was the statutory equivalent. All that could be pleaded against that was the implied entry of the Misses Callum, who had not paid a casualty; but implied entry could not prejudice a superior's right to recover a casualty.[2] Dick Lauder v. Thornton[3] and Church of Scotland v. Watson[4] were clearly distinguishable, for in these cases the fee was full through the existence of a vassal who had paid a casualty. If necessary the pursuers were prepared to add to the summons a conclusion founded on the contractual obligations in the feu-charter.

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After referring to the points raised in the Outer-House, proceeded)—That disposes of the reclaiming note so far as the pleas urged before the Lord Ordinary are concerned, but in this Court two other pleas were put forward by the defender. The first was that here there was no room for the statutory action, and in support of that plea the defender cited the cases of the Church of Scotland v. Watson[4] and Dick Lauder v. Thornton.[3] Now, these two cases decided this, that where you have a prohibition of subinfeudation fenced with irritant clauses, the compulsitor which a superior has in these circumstances to enforce the recovery of his casualty (whether it be taxed or not) depends on the contractual right which is expressed in the feu-charter; and consequently the action is a purely petitory one, helped out by declaratory conclusions of the irritancy to make it effective, but is not the old action of a declarator of non-entry. That is quite clear, but it is not to the point in the present case. The defender has ignored the fact that in both these cases the fee was full, while here the fee is empty. The last entered vassal died in 1842, and no one has paid a casualty as heir or singular successor since that date. I see no reason for holding, and no reason has been suggested to us, that there is anything inconsistent in both rights existing in the superior together—that is to say, the common law right of declarator of non-entry or its modern statutory equivalent, and also the right to sue on his contract, if the feu-charter gives him a contractual right. There may be puzzles in working out these contractual rights in cases where the charter deals with a whole superiority which has de facto been subsequently divided into separate portions, but it is sufficient to deal with these puzzles when they arise for decision. In this case the pursuers' counsel says,—"It does not matter what my contractual rights may be, for here I am suing at common law on the ground that my fee is empty, and I am entitled to the payment of a casualty before I enter another vassal." Section 4, subsection 3, of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 preserves all rights of the superior to the enforcement of his casualty in spite of the implied entry granted to the successors of a vassal by that Act. Now, the only entry pleaded here is the implied entry of the Misses Callum, who admittedly never paid a casualty, and consequently, in virtue of the subsection I have referred to, that entry cannot be pleaded as a defence to this action. It appears to me quite clear that if the Act of 1874 had not been passed the pursuers here would have been entitled to raise an action of declarator of non-entry, and therefore I do not think any relevant defence can be stated to the form in which the present action has been brought.

Lord Kinnear.—(After dealing with the other points argued before the Court, proceeded)—The only remaining point is whether the pursuer has a good action in the form in which this action was originally brought. The defender founded on something which I am reported to have said in the case of the Church of Scotland v. Watson and Others[1] as suggesting that an implied entry under the statute might fill the fee, and so be a good answer to the statutory action in room of a declarator of non-entry. But this is contrary to the express words of the statute, and I do not think the observation cited, when read with reference to its context, will bear the meaning ascribed to it. I held both in that case and in Dick Lauder v. Thornton[2] that when a disponee had completed a title on an a me holding only, so as entirely to dispossess the disponer and take up the position of vassal in his room, the superior was entitled to enforce against him all the prestations of the feu-charter or contract, because he could not hold the land by virtue of the superior's grant without complying with the conditions of the grant. But then a superior cannot enforce the conditions of a charter as against an entered vassal on the express ground that he has taken infeftment, or, in other words, has entered, and at the same time deny that he has entered and allege that the fee is empty. It appeared to me therefore that when a superior claimed to enforce the terms of the charter as against an entered vassal, his proper action was an action on the contract, and not the statutory action in lieu of the declarator of non-entry. But, on the other hand, he is not bound to rely on the contract if there is no other vassal in life except a disponee who has entered by implication of the statute. He is quite entitled in that case to bring the statutory action on the ground that there is no vassal in the fee, and the implied entry will afford no defence to that action. It will still be perfectly competent, if the vassal entered by implication is found to be liable or admits his liability for a casualty, to refer to the terms of the charter or contract for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due. But the action will not be an action upon the contract, but the statutory action. But in the present case this question does not arise. There is no vassal in life who has paid a casualty, and therefore there is no pretence for saying that the action is brought sooner than a declarator of non-entry could have been raised under the old law. The superior has no vassal except the defender, who is undoubtedly liable for the casualty, and it seems to me immaterial whether the liability is enforced under the original or under the new conclusion of the summons.

[2] 17 R. 320.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

BY articles and conditions of roup, dated 17th December 1903, Mrs Annie Grierson Roscoe, wife of Henry W. K. Roscoe, Streatley, Reading, Berkshire, with advice and consent of her husband, and her husband for his own right and interest, exposed the shop and back shop, No. 26 Montrose Terrace, Abbeybill, Edinburgh, to sale by public roup, on 23d March 1904, at the upset price of £180, under the powers of a bond and disposition in security over the subjects, dated 11th, and recorded 12th June 1883, in favour of Mrs Roscoe, then Miss Lee.

At the sale on 23d March no one appeared to offer the upset price, and the sale was adjourned to 20th April, when the subjects were exposed at the reduced upset price of £130, and were sold to William Robert Mackersy, W.S., Edinburgh, at the reduced upset price.

Mr Mackersy having refused to implement the sale, on the ground that Mrs Roscoe had not tendered to him a valid and marketable title, Mrs Roscoe and her husband brought an action against Mr Mackersy concluding for decree ordaining him to implement the contract of sale by accepting a valid disposition in his favour, and paying the price, £130, with interest, and failing implement within three weeks from the date of decree, for £100 as damages.

The defender stated the following objections to the title offered by the pursuers:—

1. The minute of re-exposure annexed to the articles of roup was signed by Mr W. B. Rainnie, S.S.C., Mrs Roscoe's agent. The defender's first objection (which was not pressed in the Inner-House) was that it was incompetent for Mrs Roscoe, as the "grantee," within the meaning of sec. 3 of the Titles to Lands Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, of a bond and disposition in security, thus to delegate her powers under sec. 119 of that Act—that the only case in which it was competent for a law-agent to sign on behalf of the grantee of a bond and disposition in security in connection with a sale of the security subjects, was the case expressly provided for in sec. 49 and Schedule L of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

2. The defender further objected;—(Stat. 6) "The first exposure of said subjects . . . was not duly advertised in terms of" section 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, "the necessary full period of six weeks not having elapsed between the first advertisement in the Scotsman of 10th February 1904, and the date of said first exposure which took place on 23d March 1904,—the period thereby embraced being one day short of the requisite period. This failure on the part of the pursuers to observe an important requirement renders the title offered by the pursuers to the defender worthless."

3. The defender's last objection was,—(Stat. 7) "The pursuers in said proceeding failed to observe another statutory requirement in so far as . . . said articles of roup did not specify the name of the particular bank in which any surplus price that there might be was to be consigned, in terms of section 122 of said Act."

On 10th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the objections stated by the defender to the title offered by the pursuers cannot be sustained: Therefore appoints the defender to implement and fulfil in all respects his part of the contract of sale of the subjects libelled, and that by accepting a valid disposition of the same in his favour, containing all usual and necessary clauses executed by pursuers of said subjects; also to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £130, the price of the same, with interest as concluded for, and that within three weeks from the date hereof: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and to report; quoad ultra continues the cause."*

On 3d December 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following further interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, in respect the defender has failed to implement the preceding interlocutor, finds the pursuers entitled to damages: Of consent assesses the same at £25, for which sum decerns against the defender as in full of the conclusions of the summons," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The 119th section of the Act of 1868 required advertisement "once weekly for at least six weeks." That meant that a period of at least forty-two clear days must elapse between the day of the first advertisement and the day of exposure; advertisement once in each of six consecutive weeks, so that the last advertisement might be on the first day of the last week, and the exposure on the day immediately following was not sufficient; the debtor was entitled to have the advertisement before the public eye for a period of at least six complete weeks.[1] Here first exposure took place on the forty-second day after the day of the first advertisement, and it was said that the rule dies inceptus applied; but the rule was in favoribilibus, dies inceptus pro completo habetur, i.e., the person pleading the rule must have a presumption in his

* "OPINION.—In this case the defender takes, I think, three objections to the title offered to him as purchaser of the property in question.

"His first objection is that there was no valid exposure, in respect that the minute of exposure was signed not by the creditor who was selling the property under the powers in his bond, but by the creditor's agent. As to that objection, there being no question of the agent's authority, I confess that it does not appear to me to be stateable.

"The second objection is, I think, on examination, also untenable. It is said that forty-two days had not elapsed between the date of the first advertisement and the sale. But the answer to that is, that forty-two days had elapsed—that is to say, that there had been a full period of forty-two days between the morning of the day when the first advertisement appeared and the morning of the day when the sale took place. That, I think, amply satisfied the statutory requirement, that the prescribed advertisements should be inserted during a period of six weeks preceding the sale.

"That leaves only the third objection, which is founded on this, that the articles of roup did not contain a statement of the name of the bank in which the surplus price falling to the owner of the property was to be consigned in the event of the property realising a surplus over and above the exposer's debt. I have looked into this matter, which turns upon the terms of the 122d section of the Act of 1868, and I am far from saying that, if there had been here a surplus, it might not have been possible for the defender to contend that the sale was subject to challenge by the owner of the property, in respect that there had not been the prescribed intimation to him of the bank where the surplus was to be consigned. But, in the present case, it seems enough to say that there has been, in fact, no surplus; that the sale was one in which no surplus could possibly arise; and that, therefore, the owner of the property could not, under the 122d section, make any claim or raise any question. I have come, therefore, to the conclusion that this objection is also untenable. And I am further of opinion, having considered the question of expenses, that none of the defender's objections were substantial, and that, therefore, he must be found liable in expenses."

favour,[1] and here the presumption was in favour of the debtor, not of the creditor.[2] In any view the day on which the first advertisement appeared ought to be excluded.[3] (2) The bank in which consignation of the surplus was to be made had not been specified in the articles of roup as required by section 122 of the Act of 1868. That was fatal to the validity of the sale. The Lord Ordinary got over the difficulty by assuming that there could not possibly be a surplus, but that, however probable, could be known only as the result of the sale. In sales under the powers of a bond the statutory requirements must be strictly complied with. (3) The defender's objections were not frivolous; he was therefore entitled to his expenses.[4]

The arguments of the pursuers sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Kincairney.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD KYLLACHY, and LORD KINCAIRNEY) was delivered by—

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—Two interlocutors were submitted for review by this reclaiming note. I am of opinion that both are right and ought to be affirmed.

The action is brought to enforce the sale of a shop and back shop in Montrose Terrace, Regent Road, Abbeyhill, which were sold by public roup on a second exposure on 20th April 1904, under powers in a bond, and were purchased by the defender, who has objected that the title tendered by the pursuers is not marketable. The defender's objections to the title are specified in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

Nothing need be said about the first objection, which is plainly bad, and was, I understood, withdrawn at the debate. The principal objection is the second, which is, that the first exposure was not duly advertised in terms of the 119th section of the Titles to Land Act. The defender avers that the necessary full period of six weeks had not elapsed between the first advertisement in the Scotsman of 10th February and the date of the first exposure on 23d March 1904, "the period thereby embraced being one day short of the requisite period." The defender does not explain how he proposes to compute the requisite period, or whether he proposes to include the first day of advertisement and the day of exposure, or one of them, or neither. If he excludes both of these days, then it is true that there will be only forty-one days to be reckoned as falling between the first advertisement and the exposure, but if he includes either of these days there will be forty-two days between the first advertisement and the exposure.

The Lord Ordinary has expressed the opinion, on grounds which he has explained, that forty-two days elapsed between the first advertisement and the exposure, and I agree in that opinion. But the statute does not expressly require the lapse of any period between the one day and the other, but is expressed quite differently, because it requires the publication of the date and place of sale once weekly for at least six weeks, and it seems not doubtful that that requirement has been fulfilled, and indeed there is no averment to the contrary. There is no doubt that this sale has been advertised for six weeks weekly, so that I doubt whether this objection is supported by any relevant averment. At all events I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the objection must be repelled.

The third objection is somewhat singular. It is that the bank in which the surplus arising on the sale was to be consigned is not mentioned in the articles of roup, as required by the 122d section of the Titles to Land Act. It may be observed that the requirement is that the bank should be named at a time when it was necessarily uncertain whether there would be any surplus, so that the fact that in this case there was no surplus does not prevent the application of the section to the case nor affect the assertion that there has been an undoubted disregard of the requirement of the statute, although, as the facts have turned out, it has been a disregard which is of no consequence whatever. I find no provision in the Act that a neglect of that requirement shall, when there is no surplus, affect the competency of the procedure. I therefore am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 10th November 1904 should be affirmed.

I do not recollect that the interlocutor of 3d December 1904 was challenged if the interlocutor of 10th November was affirmed, and I see no ground for such a challenge.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

IN August 1897, Henry M'Intosh, musicseller, 130 George Street, Edinburgh, let a piano on hire to Mrs Helen M. Turnbull, residing at St Ann's Villa, Strathearn Road, Edinburgh, and the piano was taken to that house, of which Mrs Turnbull was the tenant and Miss Mary Potts the landlord.

On 20th July 1904, Miss Potts presented a petition for sequestration of the effects in Mrs Turnbull's dwelling-house in security and for payment (1) of the sum of £35, being half year's rent payable at Martinmas 1903, and (2) of the sum of £35 which became due and payable at Whitsunday 1904. Warrant to sell was granted on 22d July. The piano was included in the inventory.

On 2d November 1904 the agents of M'Intosh wrote to Miss Potts' agent:—"You are aware that in May 1900 our client had some correspondence with you relative to this piano. You then refused to allow it to be removed, as it was hypothecated for the rent of that year.* We now write to say that if the rent of that year be paid our client claims the piano, and you cannot hypothecate it for the rent of subsequent years, since you have prevented our client from removing it."

Miss Potts' agent replied that she declined to give up the piano.

The sale took place on 15th November 1904. The piano was entered in the list of sequestrated effects as follows:—"Walnut-cased cottage piano, by H. M'Intosh, said to be on hire." It was sold along with the other effects. M'Intosh did not appear in the sequestration process or at the sale.

In December 1904, M'Intosh brought the present action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, against Miss Potts (Mrs Turnbull being called for any interest she might have), praying for decree ordaining Miss Potts to pay to the pursuer £33 as the value of the piano.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 8) "After sundry procedure the defender obtained a warrant of sale under said sequestration 'to sell so much of the sequestrated effects as will pay' the two rents in question, being £70, and expenses. Under this warrant effects belonging to the said Mrs Turnbull, amounting in value to £142, 14s. 6d., being more than double the rents for which the said process of sequestration was obtained, were sold. This sale was greatly in excess of what the warrant authorised, yet notwithstanding thereof defender wrongfully and illegally sold the pursuer's said piano, over and above Mrs Turnbull's said effects, the value of which is at least £33, and for which value the defender is liable to the pursuer." (Cond. 9) "It was the defender's duty to have, in any event, sold her tenant's effects before touching the pursuer's piano, and to have stopped the sale as soon as the effects sold were reasonably sufficient to cover the sums in the warrant, and the sale so far as regards the pursuer's piano was, to the knowledge of the defender, wholly illegal and without warrant or justification of any kind." (Cond. 10) "The process of sequestration and the roup roll, which are all before the Court, are referred to."

The report of the sale and roup roll shewed that the whole effects realised £170, 1s., that £92, 19s. had been realised before the piano was put up for sale; that the piano realised £17, 6s. 6d.; that the taxes amounted to £10, 13s. 5d., including £3, 5s. 6d. retainable from the landlord on payment of rent; that the expenses of the sale amounted to £20, 13s. 7d.; and that the rent due to the defender and her agent's expenses amounted to £80, 2s. 2d. In the sequestration the Sheriff-substitute granted decree in the defender's favour for £80, 2s. 2d. less £3, 5s. 6d., the taxes retainable from the landlord on payment of the rent.

In the present action the pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Esto that the piano was properly included in the sequestration for the rents which became due (1) at Martinmas 1903, and (2) at Whitsunday 1904; and these rents having been more than met by the proceeds of the sale of the effects belonging to the defender's tenant, Mrs Turnbull, and the defender being aware that the instrument was the property of the pursuer, said sale was illegal and unwarrantable, and the defender is liable for the value of the instrument.

* This referred to a prior sequestration which had lapsed through payment of the rent.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant.

On 13th March 1905 the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the closed record, productions, and whole process, sustains the second plea in law for the defender Miss Potts, and therefore dismisses the action as irrelevant: Finds the defender Miss Potts entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pursuer admitted that the piano fell under the landlord's hypothec, and that the defender was entitled to sell the piano if she could not get payment of the rent otherwise. But a warrant to sell, in a sequestration for rent, must be exercised reasonably in the interests of all concerned. That was settled as in a question between the landlord and the tenant,[1] and the principle applied to the property of third parties which, although technically within the sequestration, was to the knowledge of the landlord not the property of the tenant. The principle did not depend on the contract of landlord and tenant, but upon delict—the wrongous use of diligence; and an action ex delicto was as much open to a third party as to the tenant. Here it was plain that the defender, if not personally, at least through her agent, knew perfectly well that this piano belonged to the pursuer, and she had no interest to have it sold since the result of the sale shewed that the tenant's own effects were amply sufficient to cover all the defender's claims in the widest view of them. It was her duty therefore to have reserved the sale of the piano to await the result of the sale of the tenant's own effects. In any view the piano had been put up for sale at a time when enough had already been realised by the sale of the tenant's own effects to satisfy all the defender's claims, and when, consequently, her warrant to sell was exhausted. Her rent and her law-agent's expenses had clearly been satisfied. She had nothing to do with the payment of the taxes, except in so far as a portion of the taxes was deducted from her rent on payment to her; and as the expenses of the sale were fixed mainly by commission, only the proportion effeiring to the effects already sold fell to be added to the sum for which she had warrant to sell. This addition did not bring her claim beyond the sum already realised, but even if it was necessary to realise a pound or two more, it was an oppressive use of the warrant, even in a question with the tenant, to put up a valuable piano when an article of much smaller value would have been sufficient.

Argued for the defender;—The pursuer admitted that the piano fell within the sequestration, but he argued that because the defender knew that the piano belonged to him it was her duty to reserve the sale of the piano to await the result of the sale of the tenant's own effects. The defender, or at least her agent, no doubt knew that the pursuer claimed the piano, but the knowledge of that claim did not impose on the defender the duty of looking after the pursuer's interests. It was for the pursuer to appear in the sequestration or at the sale—which he had a title to do[1]—and by application to the Sheriff, or to the Sheriff-Clerk as judge of the roup, to protect his own interests as he thought best. As to the argument that when the piano was put up for sale enough had been realised to satisfy the defender's claims, that failed on the facts. It might be that a proportion of the expenses of the sale did not fall to be taken into account, and it might also be that the defender had not a direct warrant to sell for payment of the taxes, but it was the duty of the Sheriff-Clerk to retain the amount of the taxes out of the proceeds of the sale, which meant practically that the defender was entitled to sell for the amount of her claim plus the taxes, and this, with a proportion of the expenses of the sale, brought out a sum considerably in excess of the sum realised when the piano was put up for sale. Even on the pursuer's view of the amount of the defender's claims his case failed, for at the best he brought out only a very small surplus of realised proceeds over the defender's claims, and a landlord who had sequestrated for rent was entitled to go on selling the sequestrated subjects until his claims were safely covered.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In moving your Lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which is the course I propose, I do not desire to be held as agreeing with all that he has said. The case seems simple enough. It is not disputed that this piano fell within the sequestration, and it is not disputed that it did not matter whether it was the first or tenth, or any other number in the list of articles sold, if it was put up as a lot for sale when what had been already knocked down had not produced enough money to make up the amount due to the landlord. The case that is made is this: that the roup roll having been made up, and the sale being in progress at the time the piano was reached, it was a question whether the creditor would be cleared before it was knocked down. In my opinion it is not shewn that the creditor was so clear as to make it his duty to have stopped the sale going on. There was a slight margin above the debt due to him and expenses, without taking into account the taxes due, but it is evident that these are matters which the Sheriff-Clerk deals with in such cases. The creditor was entitled to go on selling until he was safely covered as regards his debt, and it is a matter of accident that the last article sold is one which provides a sum considerably in excess over what he is entitled to get. There was therefore no oppression as far as the selling of the piano is concerned. As to the order in which it was sold, it might have been different if the owner of the piano had taken means to prevent it being sold when there were sufficient goods to sell belonging to the tenant. He might have gone to the judge of the roup and asked that this should not be put up till the other articles had been sold. If the judge of the roup had resisted this appeal, or if the creditor had opposed the postponement, it may be that a case of oppression might have been made out. But nothing of this sort took place, and in the circumstances which occurred there is no such case.

June 8, 1905. M'Intosh v. Potts.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree. The pursuer put his case upon two grounds —first, that it was sufficiently clear that this piano had been put up for sale after enough had been realised to pay the whole debt due to the landlord with all expenses and charges which fell to be added. To this it is a good answer that on the figures the pursuer's statement is not correct—that is to say, not correct unless we discard the taxes and a very large part of the expenses of the sale. Therefore the first ground fails.

As regards the second ground, that it was oppressive, and therefore unlawful, to put the piano up otherwise than at the end of the sale, it is, I think, enough to point out that the pursuer could, if he chose, have applied to the Sheriff and asked that the warrant to sell should be granted subject to the condition that the piano should be kept to the last; or could have attended the sale, and asked the Sheriff-Clerk, who was the judge of the roup, that the piano should not be put up till the goods truly belonging to the debtor had first been sold. He did not take either course, and I therefore am not prepared to differ from the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer's statements are not relevant.

LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree. I only desire to add that the judgment we are pronouncing being one on relevancy, we are bound to take the averments of the pursuer as explained by Mr Morison. But taking it so, it is clear that the margin of money recovered at the time when the piano was sold, over and above the debt and expenses, was too small to admit of an action of damages on the ground of oppression or illegality. It would be necessary for that purpose to shew that the creditor had gone on with the sale after the amount of his debt had been materially and considerably exceeded. As regards the pursuer's complaint that the piano need not have been sold at all, the pursuer had a clear and easy means of preventing the result by going to the Sheriff or the judge of the roup, and this course he failed to take.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

the sale—which he had a title to do[1]—and by application to the Sheriff, or to the Sheriff-Clerk as judge of the roup, to protect his own interests as he thought best. As to the argument that when the piano was put up for sale enough had been realised to satisfy the defender's claims, that failed on the facts. It might be that a proportion of the expenses of the sale did not fall to be taken into account, and it might also be that the defender had not a direct warrant to sell for payment of the taxes, but it was the duty of the Sheriff-Clerk to retain the amount of the taxes out of the proceeds of the sale, which meant practically that the defender was entitled to sell for the amount of her claim plus the taxes, and this, with a proportion of the expenses of the sale, brought out a sum considerably in excess of the sum realised when the piano was put up for sale. Even on the pursuer's view of the amount of the defender's claims his case failed, for at the best he brought out only a very small surplus of realised proceeds over the defender's claims, and a landlord who had sequestrated for rent was entitled to go on selling the sequestrated subjects until his claims were safely covered.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In moving your Lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which is the course I propose, I do not desire to be held as agreeing with all that he has said. The case seems simple enough. It is not disputed that this piano fell within the sequestration, and it is not disputed that it did not matter whether it was the first or tenth, or any other number in the list of articles sold, if it was put up as a lot for sale when what had been already knocked down had not produced enough money to make up the amount due to the landlord. The case that is made is this: that the roup roll having been made up, and the sale being in progress at the time the piano was reached, it was a question whether the creditor would be cleared before it was knocked down. In my opinion it is not shewn that the creditor was so clear as to make it his duty to have stopped the sale going on. There was a slight margin above the debt due to him and expenses, without taking into account the taxes due, but it is evident that these are matters which the Sheriff-Clerk deals with in such cases. The creditor was entitled to go on selling until he was safely covered as regards his debt, and it is a matter of accident that the last article sold is one which provides a sum considerably in excess over what he is entitled to get. There was therefore no oppression as far as the selling of the piano is concerned. As to the order in which it was sold, it might have been different if the owner of the piano had taken means to prevent it being sold when there were sufficient goods to sell belonging to the tenant. He might have gone to the judge of the roup and asked that this should not be put up till the other articles had been sold. If the judge of the roup had resisted this appeal, or if the creditor had opposed the postponement, it may be that a case of oppression might have been made out. But nothing of this sort took place, and in the circumstances which occurred there is no such case.

June 8, 1905. M'Intosh v. Potts.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree. The pursuer put his case upon two grounds —first, that it was sufficiently clear that this piano had been put up for sale after enough had been realised to pay the whole debt due to the landlord with all expenses and charges which fell to be added. To this it is a good answer that on the figures the pursuer's statement is not correct—that is to say, not correct unless we discard the taxes and a very large part of the expenses of the sale. Therefore the first ground fails.

As regards the second ground, that it was oppressive, and therefore unlawful, to put the piano up otherwise than at the end of the sale, it is, I think, enough to point out that the pursuer could, if he chose, have applied to the Sheriff and asked that the warrant to sell should be granted subject to the condition that the piano should be kept to the last; or could have attended the sale, and asked the Sheriff-Clerk, who was the judge of the roup, that the piano should not be put up till the goods truly belonging to the debtor had first been sold. He did not take either course, and I therefore am not prepared to differ from the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer's statements are not relevant.

LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree. I only desire to add that the judgment we are pronouncing being one on relevancy, we are bound to take the averments of the pursuer as explained by Mr Morison. But taking it so, it is clear that the margin of money recovered at the time when the piano was sold, over and above the debt and expenses, was too small to admit of an action of damages on the ground of oppression or illegality. It would be necessary for that purpose to shew that the creditor had gone on with the sale after the amount of his debt had been materially and considerably exceeded. As regards the pursuer's complaint that the piano need not have been sold at all, the pursuer had a clear and easy means of preventing the result by going to the Sheriff or the judge of the roup, and this course he failed to take.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The Court, being of opinion that the pursuer's averments disclosed a case which could not reasonably entitle him to a verdict for £40 damages, refused the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof.

Rule of Sharples v. Yuill & Company, supra, p. 657, applied.

JOHN DAWSON, docker, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against Stewart & Shaw, stevedores, for £150 as damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "On 9th March 1905 the pursuer was in the employment of the defenders as a workman at the discharging of iron ore from the main hatch of the steamship 'Palatyne' at the General Terminus, Glasgow." (Cond. 5) When engaged in this employment the pursuer "was struck on the right wrist by a piece of ore weighing about seven or eight pounds that fell from the ship's beam directly above him, and sustained injuries to his wrist, which necessitated him going to the Western Infirmary, where the wound was stitched. Pursuer will be unable to resume work for a considerable time to come." The pursuer further averred that the accident was due to the fault of a foreman in the employment of the defenders, and that the pursuer's wages averaged 30s. a week.

The action was raised within a week of the accident condescended on.

On 17th May the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) closed the record and allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

In Single Bills the defenders moved that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for proof.

Argued for the defenders;—The record here disclosed on the face of it a claim which could not reasonably entitle the pursuer to a verdict of anything like £40; therefore, in accordance with Sharples v. Yuill & Company,[1] jury trial should be refused and the action remitted to the Sheriff Court for proof.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer's averments entitled him to have the case tried by a jury. Unless a pursuer's averments disclosed a case so trumpery that no jury, acting reasonably, would award anything like £40, jury trial would be allowed.[2] The pursuer's averments shewed a case of substantial injury.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I must say if there ever was a case in which the rule should be applied which has been laid down by the Lord President in Sharples v. Yuill & Company,[1] that a case must be remitted to the Sheriff for proof if it does not appear on the averments of the pursuer that a jury could reasonably give a sum of £40—this is that case. The averment here is that owing to an accident the pursuer was wounded on the wrist, that it was necessary to have the wound stitched, and that it will be some time before he is able to return to work. That is all that he is able to state, and it indicates no case of serious injury. In these circumstances it would be an injustice, not only to the defender but to the pursuer also, to send the case to a jury.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of opinion that this case should go back to the LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I agree. The accident happened on 9th March, and it is averred on the record, which was not closed till 17th May, that the pursuer would not be able to resume work for a considerable time. I hesitate to call that a slight injury which disables a man for work for two or three months. But that averment is very vague, and the only specific statement indicates a slight injury for which, as averred, there is no probability that a jury would award £40.

Macdonald v. Mackintosh.

DUNCAN MACDONALD, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Watt, K.C.—Garson.
JOHN MACKINTOSH, Defender (Respondent).—M'Lennan, K.C.—Cullen.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Discharge of trustee and of bankrupt—Abandonment of asset by trustee and creditors.—In March 1898 Macdonald, a butcher, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of Mackintosh as trustee. In December 1899 the trust was superseded by the sequestration of Macdonald's estates under the Bankruptcy Acts. In April 1902 Macdonald was discharged, but not retrocessed. The trustee in the sequestration was also discharged.

In July 1904 Macdonald brought an action against Mackintosh for decree ordaining him to account for his intromissions as trustee under the trust for creditors and for payment to the pursuer of such balance as might be found to be due. The pursuer, who admittedly sued for his own behoof, averred that the defender, while trustee under the trust for creditors, had illegally purchased or appropriated the pursuer's business; that the defender had never accounted therefor to the trustee in the sequestration; that the defender had never been discharged as trustee; and that "the trustee and creditors in the sequestration abandoned any right they had to recover any assets of the pursuer's estates in the hands of the defender as trustee foresaid."

The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Dundas) dismissed the action, holding that there was no relevant averment of abandonment.

2D DIVISION. Lord Dundas.

ON 31st March 1898 Donald Macdonald, flesher, 52 Eastgate, Inverness, executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of John Mackintosh, sheep and cattle dealer, Glenholme, Crown Drive, Inverness, with a consultative committee of creditors.

On 22d December 1899 the trust was superseded by sequestration under the Bankruptcy Acts. David Munro, solicitor, Inverness, was appointed trustee in the sequestration.

On 18th April 1902 the trustee in the sequestration was discharged, and Macdonald, the bankrupt, was also discharged, but was

[1] Supra, p. 657.

No. 139. not retrocessed. A dividend of 1½d. in the £1 was paid in the sequestration; no dividend was paid under the trust for creditors.

June 9, 1905. Macdonald v. Mackintosh. In July 1904 Macdonald raised an action against Mackintosh, concluding (after certain declaratory conclusions) for decree ordaining the defender to produce a full account "of the whole intromissions had, or which must in law be held to have been had, by the defender," as trustee under the trust for the pursuer's creditors, and for decree ordaining the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £8000 or of such other sum as should appear to be due by the defender as the balance of his intromissions.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) At a meeting of the pursuer's creditors on 31st March 1898, when the defender accepted office as trustee, "it was arranged that the defender, as trustee foresaid, should carry on the business, and that the pursuer should be employed in the shop at the wages of £2 per week," and accordingly "the defender carried on the pursuer's business of flesher, with the assistance of the pursuer, from the date of the trust-deed until the latter's services were dispensed with by the defender on 6th May 1899 as after mentioned. . . ." (Cond. 6) "Notwithstanding that the said trust-deed was granted by the pursuer primarily for behoof of all his creditors and for his own behoof quoad any reversion, . . . the pursuer was, towards the end of April 1899, informed . . . that the committee of creditors appointed at the meeting on 31st March 1898 had disposed of his, the pursuer's business, to the defender, and had authorised him to take possession of the shop and business for his own behoof. . . . The defender paid nothing whatever for the goodwill of the business, which was a valuable asset of pursuer's estate. His alleged purchase or appropriation of pursuer's business was illegal and greatly to the prejudice of the pursuer and his creditors. . . ." (Cond. 7) "It is averred that the defender, while acting as trustee under the said trust-deed, in or about May 1899, illegally appropriated the pursuer's said business without giving any consideration therefor, and thereafter carried it on exclusively for his own behoof. . . ." (Cond. 8) "On 6th May 1899 the defender called at the shop, 52 Eastgate, Inverness, and dismissed the pursuer from the employment of the trust. . . . The defender there and then demanded and got delivery of the keys of the shop, and took possession of the shop and its contents and of the business. . . ." (Cond. 9) "The defender has, in breach of his duty as trustee foresaid, carried on the said business formed by the pursuer, for his own behoof exclusively, and has ever since illegally appropriated the profits made therefrom to his own uses and purposes, and not for behoof of the pursuer's creditors, or of the pursuer. . . ."

(Cond. 10) "Shortly after being ousted from his shop on 6th May 1899, the pursuer began to press for information regarding his estate and the liquidation of his affairs, but without any result. With a view, it is believed, to render the pursuer notour bankrupt, and thereby prevent proceedings at his instance to compel an accounting by the defender, an action was, at defender's instigation, raised in the Sheriff Small Debt Court, at Inverness, on 20th July 1899," at the instance of a creditor against the pursuer, which resulted in the defender being made notour bankrupt, and in the sequestration of his estates. The claims ranked for in the sequestration "were unvouched and not due by pursuer. In particular, the defender ranked for £4946, 3s. 4d. which was not due to him, and which was unvouched.

June 9, 1905. Macdonald v. Mackintosh.

The pursuer and the trustee on the sequestrated estate were both discharged" on 18th April 1902. "No discharge has ever been granted to the defender, as trustee under the trust-deed, either by the trustee in the sequestration or by the pursuer. Notwithstanding the existence of the sequestration, the defender, as trustee foresaid, with the consent or acquiescence of the said David Munro, as trustee on the pursuer's sequestrated estates, was left in possession of the said shop, stock, and fittings, and continued to carry on the said business, and was never called on to account for his intromissions in connection with the said business. The trustee and the creditors in the sequestration abandoned that asset, and left it to the pursuer to recover it if he cared to. Except to a very limited extent . . . the defender, as trustee foresaid, has not denuded himself of the trust-estate and effects. . . ." (Cond. 16) " . . . The pursuer's agents having, on 21st January 1903, written Mr Munro whether he, as trustee, had granted such a discharge to the defender as trustee under the trust-deed, received the reply that 'the matter in question was duly considered by the trustee although no discharge was granted to Mackintosh (defender), and Mackintosh supplied the trustee with the information necessary. If Mr Macdonald (the pursuer) has a claim against Mr Mackintosh he had better enforce it himself, as the trustee did not think it advisable to take any proceedings against Mackintosh.' It is averred that the trustee and creditors in the sequestration abandoned any right they had to recover any assets of the pursuer's estates in the hands of the defender as trustee foresaid."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The defender, as trustee foresaid, having entered upon the possession and management of the trust-estate, is bound to account for his whole intromissions therewith: Et separatim, he is bound to account for the profits derived from the said business subsequent to 6th May 1899, while he, as an individual, was in charge thereof, and the price on its sale.

The defender averred that he had duly discharged all his duties as trustee to the best of his ability, and had fully accounted to the trustee in the sequestration; and he pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No relevant case. (8) The pursuer having acquiesced in the defender's being ranked as a creditor in his sequestration, and receiving a dividend upon his claim upon the footing that he had fully accounted for his intromissions as trustee under said trust-deed, is barred personali exceptione from insisting in the present action.

On 11th March 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law for defender: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses against the pursuer; allows," &c. *

* "OPINION.—The pleadings in this case are of inordinate length and great complexity."—(His Lordship narrated the facts in the case which were not in dispute.) "The pursuer now alleges that many things were wrongfully and illegally done and left undone by the defender as trustee, and for these he seeks now to call him to account. Some of the charges made are very difficult to understand, although they are set out at great length. For example, throughout the record, and particularly in Conds. 6 and 7, there is alleged against the defender an illegal 'purchase or appropriation' of the pursuer's business. I cannot discover any relevant averment of a purchase of the business by the defender as an individual, and though the phrase 'appropriation' recurs frequently, its meaning, and the

No. 139. The pursuer reclaimed.[1]

June 9, 1905. Macdonald v. Mackintosh.

LORD KYLLACHY.—This case is not exactly within the letter of any previous decision. It is a case in which a bankrupt who has been discharged but not retrocessed makes a claim, several years after his discharge and the discharge of the trustee in his sequestration, not on behalf of his creditors but for his own behoof. In these circumstances we are not embarrassed by certain recent decisions, in particular the cases of Whyte v. Murray[2] and Geddes v. Quistorp.[3] All that these cases decided was that a bankrupt had a prima facie title to bring an action, leaving it to the Court to say whether intimation should be made to the creditors. Here the claim is by the pursuer, confessedly on his own behalf; and, recognising that, he quite frankly accepts the situation, and avers that the creditors have abandoned circumstances in which it is said to have taken place, are to me exceedingly obscure, even with such assistance as is afforded by a perusal of the defender's answers."—(His Lordship then adverted to certain other averments.) "Now, if the defender had obtained from the trustee in the sequestration a formal discharge of his whole intromissions with the estate of the bankrupt, it would, I apprehend, have been hardly possible for the pursuer now to maintain against him any of the allegations which he puts forward. Unfortunately for himself, the defender did not take steps to procure a formal discharge. It appears (Cond. 10) that he made some accounting to Mr Munro, though the pursuer avers that it was a grossly inadequate one. But it is to be observed that the defender was, or claimed to be, a large creditor of the pursuer, and that he was in fact ranked by the trustee in the sequestration for £4946, 3s. 4d., upon which he received his dividend of 1½d. per £. It is difficult to conceive that he could have been thus admitted to a ranking unless Mr Munro had been satisfied that he had duly accounted for all his intromissions with the estate; and indeed it appears from a letter, dated in January 1903, which the pursuer has incorporated (Cond. 16) as a part of his pleadings, that though no formal discharge was granted to the defender, he had supplied Mr Munro with 'the information necessary,' and the whole tone of the letter, so far as it is quoted by the pursuer, seems to shew that, in Mr Munro's view, there was and is no good claim against the defender in regard to his intromissions. Moreover, the pursuer, at and before the inception of the sequestration, was admittedly on the alert, and had (Cond. 10) been pressing for information with regard to his affairs. He now denies that the claim for which the defender was ranked was a just one (Cond. 10). Yet, so far as appears, he took no objection either to that ranking or to any other step in the sequestration. An appeal was open to him against the deliverances of the trustee under section 169 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Nor is any satisfactory explanation forthcoming as to why the present action was not raised until July 1904. These considerations, in my opinion, raise a very adverse impression of the pursuer's case, but I do not find it necessary to decide whether or not they amount to an absolute bar to the present proceedings, for there is another ground upon which, as I think, the case is fatally irrelevant. The theory of the action is that the pursuer is to recover for himself assets belonging to the estate of which the defender was for a time trustee, and which was subsequently the claim to him. The question therefore comes to be whether the pursuer has relevantly averred a case of abandonment. I am of opinion that he has not. All that is averred is that the trustee has been discharged, that the bankrupt has been discharged, and that a certain number of years has elapsed without anything having been done. The Lord Ordinary has held that an averment of abandonment in general terms is not enough, and I agree with him.

That makes it unnecessary to consider another ground of defence, for which I must say that I think there is a great deal to be said, viz., that the pursuer's claim is excluded by the fact, which appears upon the proceedings, that in his sequestration a state of accounts was made up and adjudicated on by the trustee, with the result that the present defender was decided to be not a debtor but a creditor of the pursuer—a creditor to the amount of about £5000. That adjudication by the trustee was capable of being appealed to the Sheriff or to this Court, but no appeal was taken; and it therefore seems to me that the state of accounts must be taken to have been finally fixed between the parties. If an appeal had been taken, as it might have been, to this Court, and we had found that the defender was a creditor to the extent of about £5000, that I suppose would have been conclusive. Our judgment would have been res judicata both against the bankrupt and against any new trustee who might be appointed in the sequestration. And that being so, I see no reason why the result should be different when the trustee's adjudication was acquiesced in as it seems to have been. It is not, however, necessary to express a final opinion on this point, because I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer has not relevantly averred a case of abandonment.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action on the ground that there is not a relevant averment of abandonment. I accept that view of the case, and I am not inclined to go in the least beyond it.

sequestrated. But if such assets exist, and could be recovered, the benefit would prima facie enure to the creditors of the pursuer, who have only received a dividend of 1½d. in the £, and the appropriate method of recovery would seem to be by way of a revival of the sequestration. The pursuer was apparently conscious of this difficulty, and he has sought to avoid it by the bare averment (Cond. 16, see also Cond. 10) 'that the trustee and creditors in the sequestration abandoned any right they had to recover any assets of the pursuer's estates in the hands of the defender as trustee foresaid.' Now, that, in my opinion, is not a relevant or sufficient averment of abandonment. It would require to be stated that the existence of the alleged asset was brought home to the creditors, and dealt with at their meetings, and there and then disposed of in one way or another—Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., Limited, v. Whyte, 16 R. 100, per Lord President Inglis, p. 103, affirmed 18 R. (H. L.) 37, per Lord Watson, p. 39. There must be a transaction with the trustee and creditors. Nothing of the sort is here alleged, nor are any minutes of meetings bearing upon the matter produced or said to be in existence. It is possible that the pursuer may have some right or claim capable of statement and enforcement against the defender; but, for the reasons indicated, I am of opinion that the case as presented by this summons and record is irrelevant. I shall therefore sustain the second plea in law for the defender, and dismiss the action with expenses."

Minor and Pupil—Lesion—Enorm Lesion—Compromise of Claims under Workmen's Compensation Act—Reduction on ground of Minority and Lesion—Inadequate Consideration—Effect of offer to reinstate workman in employment.—A workman, nineteen years of age, who had his right hand permanently disabled by an accident in the course of his employment and would have been entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, entered, with consent of his father, his curator, into an agreement with his employers, H. & Sons, for compensation. The agreement was contained in the following letters:—(1) A letter by the law-agent for the minor and his curator to the employers' law-agent in the following terms: "I have got my clients to agree to settle on the lines you indicated to me, viz., £25 to the lad, and £5, 5s. of expenses." "I accept your assurance that while your clients cannot guarantee a permanent situation they will do all in their power to keep him in their employment." (2) Letter by the employers' law-agent in reply,—"I have your letter in which you state that your clients are prepared to accept £25 and five guineas of expenses in discharge of all claims against" H. & Sons, "which offer I now accept." "I shall send a copy of your letter to" H. & Sons, "and draw their attention specially to the latter part of the letter."

The workman was subsequently retained in the employment of H. & Sons for three years and six months, when he was dismissed.

The workman thereupon raised an action of reduction of the agreement and of a discharge following thereon on the ground of minority and lesion.

After a proof, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) held that, as the agreement imposed no legal obligation on the employer to give employment, the money payment of £25 was the only consideration for the discharge, and that the pursuer by discharging his claim for that sum had suffered enorm lesion; and therefore reduced the discharge.

The defenders having reclaimed, the Court reversed the judgment, holding (1) that the money payment was not the only consideration for the discharge which the Court must take into account in deciding the question of lesion; and (2) that the offer of employment was a determining factor in effecting the compromise, and, looking to the circumstances of the parties at the time, was likely to be of such advantage to the minor as to make the compromise reasonable and not liable to reduction on the ground of lesion.

1st DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. (ANTE, 6 F. 770.)

This was an action for reduction, on the ground of minority and lesion, of two letters constituting an agreement, and of a discharge following thereon, whereby an injured workman, who was a minor, discharged all claims competent to him against his employers in respect of his injuries.

It was raised in the following circumstances:—

The pursuer, James Robertson, was born on 10th December 1880. In 1899 he was employed in the biscuit-making works of the defenders, S. Henderson & Sons, Limited. In November 1899, while attending to a dough-breaking machine, in the course of his employment, his right hand was caught between the rollers and crushed.

Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited.

The result of this injury was that the hand was permanently disabled. Prior to the accident the pursuer had been earning a wage of 25s. per week, but in addition to this fixed sum there were payments for overtime, which were habitually earned to a greater or less extent, so that his average wage amounted to nearly 30s. per week. After the accident his employers offered to pay him 12s. 6d. per week as compensation, being half of his fixed wage of 25s., and they continued to make this weekly payment until he returned to their employment. No memorandum of this agreement was recorded.

By the month of February 1900 the pursuer's hand had so far healed that he applied to his employers to reinstate him in their employment. This they eventually agreed to do, but refused to pay him more than £1 per week to begin with. He accepted their terms and returned to his work early in the month of March 1900. Meanwhile negotiations for a compromise of the claims competent to him for his injury had been in progress, in which the pursuer, his father, and mother, and a law-agent, had all taken part on his behalf. In the course of the negotiations the law-agent who was acting for the pursuer, wrote on 24th February 1900, to the defenders:—"You might now kindly say definitely whether you will take him back, and if so, on what terms. If you really cannot take him back, then our claim for compensation will be regulated accordingly." And again, on 9th March 1900, he wrote to the defenders' law-agent:—"My client, the young fellow who has been injured, is very desirous to be taken back without further delay, and if your clients can take him back, and pay a sum representing a commuted compensation, I have no doubt we will be able to settle." The negotiations resulted in a compromise which was embodied in the two letters passing between the parties' agents, of which reduction was sought in this action. These were:—(1) A letter written by the pursuer's agent, Mr Charles Irvine, S.S.C., to the defenders' agent, Mr R. S. Rutherford, which was in these terms:—"23d March 1900. Robertson v. Henderson & Sons, Ltd. With reference to your call yesterday, I have now seen my clients, and have got them to agree to settle on the lines you indicated to me, viz., £25 to the lad, and £5, 5s. of expenses. If, therefore, you will kindly send me your cheque and a receipt, I will undertake to get the latter signed by the lad and his father. I accept your assurance that while your clients cannot guarantee a permanent situation, they will do all in their power to keep him in their employment." (2) The defenders' agents' reply was as follows:—"23d March 1900. Robertson v. Henderson & Sons, Ltd. I have your letter of 23d inst., in which you state that your clients are prepared to accept £25 and five guineas of expenses in discharge of all claims against Messrs Henderson & Sons, Ltd., which offer I now accept on behalf of Messrs Henderson & Sons, Ltd. I shall send you the discharge to-morrow to be signed by your client and his father. I shall send a copy of your letter to Messrs Henderson & Sons, Ltd., and draw their attention specially to the latter part of the letter."

Thereafter the discharge, which was also sought to be reduced, was executed, and was in the following terms:—"I, James Robertson, residing at ten Wardlaw Place, Gorgie Road, Edinburgh, with consent and concurrence of my father, Alexander Robertson, residing there, as my curator and administrator-at-law, do hereby acknowledge to have received now and formerly from Simon Henderson & Sons, Limited, Grove Biscuit Factory, Edinburgh, the sum of £38, 2s. 6d., sterling, together with the further sum of £5, 5s. sterling in settlement of my agent's fee, making in all the sum of £43, 7s. 6d. sterling, in full payment and satisfaction of all claims at my instance against the said company in respect of injuries sustained by me, the said James Robertson, to my right hand in their factory on or about the 3d day of October 1899, and in particular of all claims for compensation competent to us against the said Simon Henderson & Sons, Limited, at common law, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, all of which claims are, with the consent and concurrence of the said Alexander Robertson, hereby discharged: And I, the said Alexander Robertson, warrant the above discharge at all hands. In witness whereof," &c. This discharge was signed on March 29th and 30th by the pursuer, and by his father as his curator and administrator-in-law. The sum of £38, 2s. 6d. mentioned in the discharge, was made up of the £25 agreed to be paid, and £13, 2s. 6d. being the amount of the twenty-one weekly payments of 12s. 6d. already made to the pursuer.

When the pursuer returned to his employment he was engaged at first in unskilled light work about the biscuit factory. After a year of this occupation he was promoted to the responsible position of an ovensman, which required chiefly care and attention, and entailed little or no manual labour. He continued in that position until October 1903, when he was dismissed on the usual week's notice.

He then raised this action of reduction of the letter and discharge already quoted, and averred (Cond. 4) that "proposals were then made for a settlement of the compensation due to the pursuer by the defenders, and defenders agreed, as pursuer understood, to pay pursuer the sum of £25, and a sum of £5, 5s. of expenses, and to keep pursuer in their employment. He now ascertains that there was no such obligation undertaken by the defenders." In Cond. 5 he averred:—"Prior to the said pretended settlement the defender's manager stated to pursuer's father, referring to pursuer, that 'his work was there for him,' and that he would get back his old situation. The pursuer's father when he signed the said receipt and discharge was under the belief, induced by the defenders, that the defenders could not dismiss pursuer, and had agreed to keep him in their service so long as he wished to work there. But for that he would never have signed the said discharge. The pursuer has recently ascertained that the defenders repudiate any obligation on their part to keep him in their service, and apart from this the sum paid as compensation was a mere trifle, and totally inadequate compensation in respect of the serious loss sustained by the pursuer." Cond. 7 was as follows:—"The pursuer was at the date of signing said receipt and discharge a minor. He was born on 10th December 1880. The said pretended agreement and receipt and discharge were executed and granted to his great hurt and lesion. At their date he was entitled in perpetuity, or until commuted, in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to such weekly compensation up to the half of his weekly wage prior to the accident as would bring his present earnings up to the amount of his former earnings. After his injury it would have been impossible for him to obtain employment in the open market at his former work. The crippled condition of his right hand has greatly restricted the classes of employment open to him, and such work as he could do is very difficult to obtain. He has endeavoured to obtain employment of any kind since the date of his dismissal, but without success, and it is believed and averred that since his injury it would have been impossible for him, and will continue to be impossible for him in the future, to earn in the open market more than 15s. per week. Since his dismissal by the defenders the pursuer has made numerous applications to find employment in his own trade, but has on each occasion been refused a situation on account of the injury to his hand." Cond. 8 was as follows:—"By the said pretended settlement and discharge the pursuer has suffered great loss and lesion. The sum paid in respect of it is grossly insufficient compensation for the loss of wages which the pursuer has suffered and would continue to suffer under employment at the rate of wages paid him by the defenders from the time of his resuming work after his injury until his dismissal. The said pretended agreement for settlement does not even stipulate for wages at any particular rate during the pursuer's re-employment. In view of the defenders' refusal to continue pursuer's employment, and to pay him the same rate of wages, his loss under the pretended settlement is greatly increased, and will amount to 10s. per week in perpetuity, or until and as commuted. On commutation the pursuer would have been entitled to a sum of at least £650."

The defenders' Answer 5 was as follows:—"Admitted that the defenders repudiate any obligation to keep the pursuer in their service, and explained that they never at any time gave him such an undertaking. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that while the defenders informed the pursuer's father that they could give him work, they expressly declined to give any undertaking, and this was made clear to the pursuer, his father, and their law-agent." And in answer 8 they explained and averred "that said discharge was signed by the pursuer and his father on their law-agent's advice on a full and fair disclosure of all the facts necessary to form a sound judgment on the question, and in point of fact the settlement was fair and reasonable in view of the circumstances thus existing."

The pursuer pleaded;—The said arrangement embodied in the letter of offer and acceptance, and the said pretended receipt and discharge having been made and executed by or on behalf of the pursuer while in minority, and to his great hurt, prejudice, and lesion, decree of reduction should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The documents challenged not having been executed to the lesion of the pursuer, the defenders ought to be assoilzied. (4) The defenders are entitled to absolvitor in respect (a) that the documents challenged concluded a fair and reasonable settlement of a doubtful claim at the pursuer's instance; (b) that said documents were acted upon as binding upon pursuer and defenders both prior and subsequent to the pursuer's minority; (c) that the pursuer is barred personali exceptione from now challenging them; and (d) that restitutio in integrum is now impossible.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) after hearing parties on the relevancy, allowed a proof before answer, and on the defenders reclaiming, the First Division adhered (reported 6 F. 770).

Proof was thereafter led, from which it appeared that the offer to restore the pursuer to his employment was the main consideration that induced the pursuer and his advisers to agree to the compromise and that they did so in the expectation that the employment would be permanent. The sum to be paid down was arranged entirely by the law-agent, and the pursuer and his relatives took no part in that discussion, and appeared to have taken but little interest in what figure was arrived at. The pursuer stated that from the conversation he had with the defenders' manager, he understood the promise to be that as long as the factory stood they would find something for him to do. That he signed the discharge for £25 on the understanding that he was to get permanent employment, and that it was on that footing alone that he took it. He also stated that he thought that a permanent situation was of more value than money down. That he considered it important to get experience in a good factory. That an ovensman occupies a position of responsibility, and that he considered it of value to get a training as ovensman. The father's evidence was to the same effect, that what he had wanted for his son was to get his work back, that he understood the offer to be of a permanent situation; that now that his son had been dismissed he did not consider that the bargain he had made was suitable and advantageous for his son; that it was almost criminal to give £25 for the loss of the right hand. Both the father and son admitted in cross-examination that they did not suppose he would be kept on whether he did his work well or ill. The law-agent's evidence was to the effect that although he got no guarantee that his client's employment was to be permanent, he understood the offer to be that he would be kept on as long as there was work for him to do, though no doubt he was liable to be dismissed for misconduct. On that understanding, with the addition of the offer of £25, he advised his clients to settle, though he had not at that time made any calculation as to what the pursuer's compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act would have amounted to.

As to the cause of dismissal, the evidence was directly contradictory, the defenders' evidence being to the effect that although the pursuer's work had been for some time satisfactory, he had latterly become careless and indifferent, and that it was only after repeated warnings that he had been dismissed. While the pursuer stated that he had all along done his best to give satisfaction, that he had never been found fault with in any way, and that his dismissal appeared to him quite unaccountable, and had taken him entirely by surprise.

As to the loss suffered by the pursuer, it appeared that prior to the accident his wages had been at the rate of 25s. per week, but that they were subject to diminution if he worked less than the regulation fifty-six hours per week, and to increase by overtime payments if he worked more. He had been acting as ovensman for some time, and while in that work, with overtime, his wages had averaged about 29s. 9d. per week, but three weeks before the accident he was transferred to the dough-kneading machine, where he worked shorter hours, and so could not earn so much. After the accident, when he had been back for a year in defenders' employment, he was advanced to the position of ovensman at a wage of 22s. per week, and at that work, with overtime, he had on an average earned about 25s. per week. The pursuer's evidence was to the effect that after his dismissal he found himself seriously handicapped in his efforts to find work. That he had made every endeavour to obtain employment in other biscuit factories, but without success, and that he had tried factories of other descriptions also, but equally unsuccessfully. That all the work he had been able to obtain had been through the influence of his father, who was a park-keeper in the employment of the corporation, and who had at first got him work in one of the parks at 12s. per week; while at present, also through his father, he was in temporary employment on one of the corporation golf courses at 18s. per week. An actuary, who gave evidence for the pursuer, stated that he had calculated the loss sustained by the pursuer on various bases. Assuming that in the future he could only earn 15s. per week, as compared with 25s. before the accident, then his loss was £502, 6s.; or, as compared with 29s. 9d. before the accident, it was £740, 18s. Assuming he could in the future earn 18s. per week, then his loss as compared with 25s. was £375, 9s. or, as compared with 29s. 9d., was £663, 9s.

On 25th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the agreement formed by the letters, dated 23d March 1900, Nos. 17 and 13 of process, and the receipt and discharge granted by the pursuer and his father, dated 29th and 30th March 1900, No. 18 of process, were concluded and granted by the pursuer when he was a minor, and were to the pursuer's great hurt, prejudice, and lesion: Therefore sustains the plea in law for the pursuer; repels the pleas in law for the defenders, and reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The defenders are biscuit-makers carrying on business in Edinburgh. The pursuer was for some time in their service, engaged in work which necessitated the use of a machine called a dough-breaking machine, and on 2d November 1899, while he was working with this machine, his right hand was accidentally caught between its rollers and was very seriously injured. Two of his fingers had to be wholly or partially amputated, and he was incapacitated for working until 3d March 1900. During that period the defenders, without (they say) admitting liability, paid him compensation at the rate of 12s. 6d. per week, which was the half of his ordinary wage, although he occasionally earned more by extra work. In March 1900 the pursuer had partially recovered, and the defenders considerately took him back to their employment. At that time a settlement was effected by two letters, dated 23d March 1900, interchanged between the agents for the parties, and by a receipt and discharge granted by the pursuer in implement of the agreement expressed in the letters. The letters were to the effect that the defenders should pay, and the pursuer accept, £25, and £5, 5s. of expenses, for a discharge of the pursuer's claims. The letter by the pursuer's agent bore,—'I accept your assurance that although your clients cannot guarantee a permanent situation, they will do all in their power to keep him in their employment.' In his reply the defenders' agent wrote that he would draw the defenders' attention specially to this clause.

"These letters were the result of previous communings and correspondence. They do not seem to have been hasty. There is no ground for supposing that the pursuer was in any way hurried. Effect was given to them by a discharge, dated 29th and 30th March 1900, by which the pursuer accepted the sums received by him as being in full satisfaction of all claims at his instance against the defenders in respect of the injuries he had sustained.

"The sum of £25 is, in point of fact, not mentioned in the receipt, which bears that £43, 7s. 6d. was the amount paid. But I understand that the apparent discrepancy is accounted for by the fact that that sum includes not the £25 only, but also other sums which had been previously paid by the defenders, and that the settlement was really what the letters express—a full discharge of the pursuer's claims for a payment of £25.

"These are the letters and the discharge which the pursuer seeks by this action to reduce.

"After this settlement the pursuer resumed his place in the defenders'

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was nothing in the nature of concealment on the part of the defenders, or of rashness on the part of the pursuer in entering upon this compromise. On the contrary it was only effected after careful consideration by the pursuer and his father and mother, and with the advice of his law-agent, and its terms had been faithfully carried out by the defenders. The contract having been entered into in these circumstances with the advice and concurrence of the minor's curator and administrator-at-law, could only be set aside on the proof of enorm lesion.[1] Enorm lesion had not been made out. The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the only consideration for the discharge here was the payment of £25. The whole weight of evidence was to the effect that the offer of the renewal of the minor's employment, and the opportunity thereby afforded to him of becoming a skilled workman, employment, and continued in it until 20th October 1903, when the defenders dismissed him. Why they did so does not very clearly appear. Up to the date of discharge they seem to have treated him extremely well. They made and make no charge against him, but say merely that he had become careless and that his work was unsatisfactory. They affirm that that was not occasioned by the injury to his hand; but I find it difficult to resist the impression that they were not unconnected.

"The pursuer avers that he believed that it was part of the bargain with the defenders that they should retain him in their employment, and that he would not have granted the discharge but for that belief; yet the pursuer does not now maintain either that the letters contain or imply such an obligation, or that the letters and discharge can be reduced on the ground of misrepresentation or error; nor does he say, in this action at least, that he can challenge his dismissal as a breach of agreement or as a wrongous dismissal; nor does he allege any fault of the defenders or make any claim of damages on account of fault. The action is founded on a totally different ground. The pursuer concedes or alleges that the defenders did not come under any obligation to receive him permanently in their service. Indeed, his case is that they did not, and is rested solely on the ground that at the date of the discharge he was a minor, having been born on 10th December 1880, and being therefore under twenty at the date of the agreement and discharge. That is the pursuer's only plea. On that account the pursuer's father became a party to the settlement, and consents to and concurs in the discharge as the curator and administrator-in-law of his son.

"The case was debated in the Procedure-roll, when a proof before further answer was allowed, and that judgment was affirmed in the Inner-House. The advising is important, and is reported as Robertson v. Henderson & Sons, Limited, 18th June 1904, 6 F. 770.

"A proof has now been taken under this interlocutor, and the effect of it has now to be determined. I regret its length, and fear that it travels into points which have not been raised or have been abandoned. It was not, however, easy wholly to exclude inquiry about the pursuer's alleged understanding that the defenders had agreed to employ him permanently, although it is not a point in the case.

"There is therefore no question in the case about misrepresentation or error in regard to the agreement or discharge; nor any question as to the defenders' fault. Nor is it alleged that the pursuer was dismissed in breach of agreement or wrongously. There is no question except on the ground of minority and lesion. It is, I take it, to be assumed that there would have been no ground of action had the pursuer been in majority.

"In granting the discharge the pursuer was acting with the advice of a were really the determining consideration. Looking to the circumstances of the parties at the time the compromise was effected, it was a reasonable compromise, and was in the best interests of the minor, and therefore could not be set aside on the ground of lesion.[1] It was admitted that the only claim which the minor could have enforced here was his right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and it was impossible for the Court to determine what sum an arbiter might have awarded under that Act. In point of fact, the pursuer here had been kept in the defenders' employment for three years, and had thereby become a fully trained ovensman, and was now capable of earning as large or larger wages than before the accident. In such circumstances an arbiter would be entitled to declare the compensation at an end.[2] The defenders had all through the negotiations that led to the compromise refused to give any guarantee of permanent employment, and that fact was fully before law-agent and of a curator. But I do not understand that the defenders plead or argue that the plea of minority and lesion is on that account not open to the pursuer; and no doubt the point is well settled in that way, although it may be that a more complete proof of lesion may be required where the minor has acted with a curator than where he has not—Ersk. i. 7, 34, 36; Bell's Prin. sec. 2100; Bell's Com. i. 130. There seems, therefore, no doubt that the plea applies, and that the question of lesion must be inquired into and is practically the only question in the case.

"I think it must be taken that the pursuer got no benefit by the settlement except the £25 paid to him. It is not contended that he acquired a valid claim to a permanent engagement, and it seems to me that he took no benefit by the clauses in the letters about his re-employment which have been quoted. These imposed no obligation on the defenders. I think parties were substantially agreed that the question is simply whether, in the whole circumstances, the payment of £25 can be held to be so wholly inadequate as to constitute the discharge granted in return for it enorm lesion in the sense of the plea.

"Now, whether there was lesion or not depends on the nature and value of the right discharged of which the pursuer was deprived. It is manifest that but for the Workmen's Compensation Act there would have been no lesion at all, for the argument is taken on the footing that no fault by the defenders has been proved, and that the pursuer had no claim to reparation or compensation either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act. But under the Workmen's Compensation Act there was a right to compensation without fault; and it has not been said that in the circumstances there was at the date of the discharge anything which could prevent the pursuer from claiming compensation under that Act.

"The right which the pursuer discharged was thus his right to claim the remedy provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act, that is to say, to claim it under arbitration. The nature of the claim is very peculiar; and Mr Bevan seems to be correct when he says that it is not compensation for pains and suffering, but rather maintenance during the period of disability—Bevan on Employers' Liability, 3d. ed., p. 388. He was at the time in receipt of 12s. 6d. per week. That had been paid since the accident, but, of course, might be subject to reduction under the provisions of the Act, particularly subsections 2, 11, 12, of section 3. Now, the pursuer has been deprived of his statutory right to make that claim. He gave it up for £25. The question is whether that claim was worth more and much more the pursuer and his advisers at the time. The defenders had acted most reasonably in keeping the pursuer in their employment for three years, and it was entirely owing to his own fault that he was eventually dismissed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer here had clearly suffered great lesion, for he had given up for totally inadequate considerations valuable rights under the Workmen's Compensation Act.[1] He had permanently lost the use of his right hand, and was for ever most seriously handicapped in his chances of obtaining employment. Under no circumstances could an arbiter for such an injury have failed to award substantial compensation, compensation to which the sum of £25 bore no reasonable proportion. The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the offer of employment could not be taken into consideration. The offer was a mere promise, not enforceable in any way, and the pursuer might have been dismissed a week after the discharge was executed. Although he had been tempted by the offer of employment to enter into the compromise, it was clear, now that he had been dismissed, that he had received no adequate consideration for the discharge of his rights, and that the compromise was an than £25. £25 is just forty times 12s. 6d., and payment of that 12s. 6d. for forty weeks would amount to £25. On this point I may refer to the opinions of the Lord President and Lord Kinnear in advising this case under the former reclaiming note.

"The Lord President, in his opinion, says that 'it is to be presumed that an arbiter will fix the amount of compensation justly and intelligently, and to prevent an injured person from having the amount due to him so fixed appears to me to be to his lesion,' not necessarily to his enorm lesion, but still to his lesion. Lord Kinnear, in his opinion, says that while the Court cannot tell what compensation an arbiter 'would have awarded or might now award, it may be possible to find that a sum fixed by agreement is less than a reasonable arbiter could have awarded, although the precise sum to be given by such an arbiter cannot be ascertained.'

"While I am not entitled to say what sum an arbiter would award to the pursuer on full inquiry, and hardly entitled to speculate upon that subject, still I seem to be warranted in coming to the opinion that this sum of £25 is less than a reasonable arbiter would have awarded, or would award in this case.

"I found that opinion on the grave nature of the injury done to the pursuer's right hand; on its probable permanence; on his consequent incapacity to earn the same wage as he formerly could earn, and also on the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which, while leaving a wide discretion to the arbiter, seems to indicate a restoration to the original wage-earning power of the injured person as frequently a guide to the amount of the compensation to be awarded. It does seem to me that £25 was greatly under the pursuer's chances before the arbiter. I require to say as much as that to warrant the finding that the lesion which the pursuer has suffered may be called enorm, while I do not say more lest I should seem in any degree to dictate to the arbiter. The matter is one for the discretion of the statutory arbiter, if the pursuer's claim be brought before him, and it will be his duty to proceed according to his own judgment on the evidence which may be laid before him, irrespective of the impression which I have formed on less complete evidence.

"On the whole, I am of opinion, that the settlement was to the enorm lesion of the minor and falls to be reduced."

improvident one, and made to his great lesion. His dismissal was purely arbitrary, and not attributable in any way to his own fault.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has been well debated on both sides, but I have little doubt in my own mind that the conclusion which the Lord Ordinary has come to is wrong. I think his Lordship's interlocutor is vitiated by a misapprehension as to the contentions of the parties. His Lordship proceeded on the view that the only consideration given in the bargain struck between the pursuer and the defenders was the pecuniary one of the sum of £25, and says that parties were substantially agreed that the whole question in the case was whether £25 was a payment so inadequate as to amount to enorm lesion to the pursuer. There has been no such agreement as to the question in the pleadings before your Lordships, and the question so put does not, in my view, present a correct view of the bargain.

The action is one of reduction, and that on one ground only, minority and lesion. The minority is admitted, and the question is whether the lesion has been proved. Lesion, in the sense of the authorities, must not be trifling, but must be enorm, which means that the consideration which the minor got must be immoderately disproportionate to what might have been got.

I have not had much difficulty in making up my mind as to the true state of the facts. It is clear that the accident to the pursuer was serious, resulting in the practical loss of all the fingers of his right hand. But it is clear that when he got well and returned to the service of the defenders he was still capable of doing the work of an ovensman, a position demanding rather common sense, attention, and watchfulness, than manual skill or strength. At the same time I think it is indisputable that his chance of employment in the open market was impaired. After his return the pursuer remained in the employment of the defenders for three years, and was then dismissed. He now raises this action on the allegation that the bargain he entered into was one that gave him a consideration entirely disproportionate to that he could have got under the Workmen's Compensation Act. But, looking at the whole bargain, he got not merely £25, but an engagement on the part of the defenders, that, though they could not guarantee him a permanent situation, they would, so far as they could, give him employment, as in fact they did. I cannot think this employment and the chance of gaining experience can be disregarded in the consideration. It is clear that the point was considered by the pursuer, his father and mother, and law-agent, and I think that, at the time, they were well advised to prefer this arrangement to getting a larger sum of money. If this is the true state of the facts the case is at an end, as the pursuer has failed to shew any enorm lesion. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer received his injury in November 1899, when nearly nineteen years of age, and was incapacitated for work till March 1900. During that period the defenders paid him 12s. 6d. per week—half his ordinary wages. In March 1900 the pursuer, after consultation with his parents and his legal adviser, entered into an agreement with the defenders to settle his claims.

By a letter, dated 23d March 1900, he offered to settle his claims for £25 and five guineas of expenses on the footing that the defenders would do all in their power to keep him in their employment. The letter, which was written by his agent, concluded thus: "I accept your assurance that, while your clients cannot guarantee a permanent situation, they will do all in their power to keep him in their employment."

On the same date the defenders' agent wrote accepting the offer, and stating that he would send a copy of the letter containing it to his clients, and "draw their attention especially to the latter part of the letter."

The sum agreed on was duly paid by the defenders, and a discharge taken of the pursuer's claims. This discharge the pursuer now seeks to set aside.

Now, the bargain between the parties is to be found in the letters above referred to, and the question is, "Was the bargain so entered into to the enorm lesion of the pursuer?"

The sole ground of reduction is minority and lesion. The minority here is admitted, and the only question therefore is was there enorm lesion to the pursuer in entering into this agreement. The point to be considered is not whether the bargain has turned out well for the pursuer, but whether at the date of the agreement it was a proper and reasonable one for him to make.

It seems to me that the fallacy in the Lord Ordinary's judgment is to be found where he says,—"I think it must be taken that the pursuer got no benefit by the settlement except the £25 paid to him. It is not contended that he acquired a valid claim to a permanent engagement, and it seems to me that he took no benefit by the clauses in the letters about his re-employment which have been quoted. These imposed no obligation on the defenders. I think parties were substantially agreed that the question is simply whether in the whole circumstances the payment of £25 can be held to be so wholly inadequate as to constitute the discharge granted in return for it enorm lesion in the sense of the plea."

If that were a correct statement of the question, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the bargain was to the enorm lesion of the pursuer. I think, however, that the most valuable part of the consideration of that agreement was the promise by the defenders to do all they could to give the pursuer employment. This may not have been an obligation which could have been enforced by law, but none the less it was a valuable consideration for this lad, and it was acted on by the defenders for three years in all honesty and good faith, and might have been still in force but for the boy's negligence. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that this agreement, which was made with the boy's consent, was in the circumstances a most sensible and reasonable one to make.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and assoilzied the defenders.

Reparation—Negligence—Master and Servant—Statutory Duty—Common Employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 58), sec. 49, Rule 21.—The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 49, enacts,—"The following general rules shall be observed, so far as is reasonably practicable, in every mine. . . . Rule 21. The roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure. . . ."

A miner who had been injured by the fall of shale from the roof of a roadway in a mine raised an action of damages at common law against his employers, the mineowners, who were a limited company, and obtained an issue, "Whether . . . the pursuer was injured through the fault of the defenders?" It was proved that about eight days before the accident there had been an extensive fall of shale from the roof at the place of the accident, and that nothing had been done prior to the accident to support the roof at this place. The jury found for the pursuer, and awarded damages.

The defenders sought to set aside the verdict on the ground (1) that there was no fault on the part of the defenders, as they were proved to have appointed a competent manager, and (2) that, if there was fault on the part of the manager it was the fault of a person in common employment with the pursuer.

Held (1) that there was fault on the part of the Company in not having the roof made secure as required by the statute, and (2) that there being a duty imposed by statute on the mineowners to have the roof made secure, the defence of common employment was not available to them.

1ST DIVISION.

ROBERT BETT, miner's drawer, with the consent of John Bett, his father, as his administrator-in-law, raised an action against the Dalmeny Oil Company, Limited, concluding for £500 as damages at common law for injuries received by him while in their employment.

On 13th April 1903, while the pursuer was engaged in pushing an empty hutch from a lye along one of the main level roads in Dalmeny Shale Mine, worked by the defenders, a quantity of shale became detached from the roof of the roadway and fell on him, and severely injured him.

For some time before the accident workmen had been employed in constructing a new underground passage in the mine, and in the course of that operation had removed part of a large pillar which had been left in working the mine on the stoop and room system. About eight days before the accident to the pursuer a large quantity of shale had fallen from the roof of the roadway at the place where the fall occurred by which the pursuer was injured, but nothing was done prior to the accident to make the roof secure.

The defenders employed skilled oversmen and firemen to see to the safety of the roads, and had supplied for use in the mine all the planks and equipment necessary for that purpose. On the morning of the accident the fireman, whose duty it was to attend to the road in question, reported that he had inspected that road among others and found it safe.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said accident not having been caused by any fault upon the part of the defenders, they ought to be assoilzied. (3) Separatim, the said accident having occurred through the fault of fellow-workmen with the pursuer, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The case was tried before the late Lord President (Lord Kinross) and a jury on the following issue:—"Whether, on or about 13th April 1903, in or near the Dalmeny Shale Mine, the pursuer was injured through the fault of the defenders, to his loss, injury, and damage?" The jury found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £250.

The facts proved, in addition to those set forth above, are sufficiently given in the opinion of Lord M'Laren.

The defenders moved for a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside as contrary to evidence, and a new trial granted. A rule was granted.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defenders were bound to take all reasonable precautions for the safety of their workmen, especially where, as in this case, the work was of a dangerous character.[1] The large fall from the roof, which happened about eight days before the accident, and at the same place, was a clear warning to the defenders that the roof was insecure and needed support, and their failure to render it secure constituted negligence at common law. Further, this failure was a breach by the defenders of the absolute duty imposed on them by statute—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 49, rule 21.[2] The defence of common employment, relied on by the defenders, was not applicable where an injury had been caused to a servant by the breach of an unqualified duty imposed upon his master for his protection.[3] The decision in Wilson v. Merry & Cuninghame[4] did not shew that the defence of common employment is applicable to an action for breach of a statutory duty, and the dicta of Lord Chelmsford in that case[5] to that effect were obiter and unsupported by authority. On a rule, the legal defence of common employment stated by the defenders could not properly be considered, the sole question being whether the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

Argued for the defenders;—The defenders had employed competent and skilled persons to see to the safety of the roads in the pit, and had supplied adequate material for that purpose. If there was any error of judgment or negligence on the part of the oversman, the defenders were not in law answerable for it, he being a reputed skilful person. Even if it was held proved that sufficient propping had not been inserted on the "stoop" being removed, this was not a defect of system, for the defenders were entitled to rely on the judgment of their skilled managers to decide in each case when and to what extent the roof required support. If there had been fault, it was fault on the part of persons in common employment with the pursuer, and therefore was not fault for which the defenders were liable at common law. The statutory duty, under the Coal Mines Regulation

Act, to keep the roof secure did not add to the civil responsibility of the defenders. The Act imposed a penalty for the breach of the regulations, but it did not have the effect of giving the pursuer a right of action which he would not have had apart from the Act, or take away from the defenders the defence of common employment open to them at common law. The decision in Groves v. Lord Wimborne[1] was not inconsistent with this principle, for the statutory duty which the defendant there neglected was a peremptory and unqualified direction, under the Factory Acts, to fence dangerous machinery, which left no room for the exercise of discretion on the part of the employers. In this case, on the other hand, the statutory rules were to be observed only "so far as is reasonably practicable," so that the question of what was necessary to keep the roof secure was left to the determination of the skilled managers. No objection or exception having been taken by the pursuer at the trial, it was not open to him now to object to the defenders putting forward the legal defence of common employment.[2]

LORD M'LAREN.—The question in this case is whether the verdict for the pursuer should be set aside as contrary to evidence. The action is founded on the common law liability of employers of labour to make such provision for the safety of the men in their employment as is reasonable and necessary. The pursuer is a miner in the employment of the Dalmeny Oil Company. For some days before the accident which resulted in injury to the pursuer the defenders' workmen were engaged in removing part of a large pillar which had been left in working out the mine by stoop and room. This was done as part of the construction of a new underground passage which was being driven through the mine. It is not disputed that this was a necessary operation, but the removal of an old pillar is a work calling for special care and attention, because it cannot be done without weakening the support of the roof, and, apart from that general consideration, the area of the exposed part of the roof is increased to the extent to which the pillar is taken away. About eight days before the accident in question, a large quantity of shale fell from the roof at this place. The witness, John Bett, says that the men were employed in clearing it, and that there were from 400 to 500 hutchfuls of stuff that came down and were taken away. He adds, "The fall that my son was injured by was at the same place, just above the plates. It broke right down. It was the same, but not so big a fall as the previous one; there was not such a mass of stuff."

The pursuer was knocked down by the second fall, and had his collar-bone fractured. He also sustained severe injuries on the head, from the effects of which he had not, at the time of the trial, fully recovered. According to the evidence of Sir Henry Littlejohn, he suffered from giddiness, and would most probably be weak for about a year.

It was not maintained that the damages awarded were excessive, if damages are due. But it was contended, on behalf of the defenders, that there was no personal fault on their part, and that they are not responsible for the fault, if any, of their manager or their oversman. On the evidence I have no doubt that there was faulty management; I mean that the fall would not have taken place if the roof of the mine had been properly supported while the operation of cutting away the pillars was in progress. Granting that the neglect to support the roof was in the beginning a mere error of judgment, the defenders were sufficiently warned by the extensive fall that took place eight days before the accident that the roof could not be relied on, and their neglect to do anything to support the roof after this warning, amounts, in my opinion, to inexcusable negligence. The weight of the engineering evidence is to this effect, if such evidence were needed; but I think this is a case where the facts point plainly to negligence; because by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (sec. 49, rule 21), the mine-owner is charged with the duty of making the roof safe, and it cannot be said that this duty has been discharged when after the roof had begun to give way nothing whatever was done to support it.

It follows then that the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless the defenders are in a position to say that this is a case falling within the rule as to common employment. Now, the principle of that rule is that it is an implied term of the contract of service that the workman takes the risk of such misfortunes as may result from the negligence of persons who are engaged in the organisation of labour of which he is a member, and that the master is only responsible for the performance of such duties as he can reasonably be supposed to undertake in person—such as the provision of a competent staff of men, adequate material, a proper system, and effective supervision. But in the case under consideration, the duty of supporting the roof is a statutory duty, and stands on a different plane from those duties which a master undertakes as implied conditions of the contract of service. The duty is not merely to provide a competent underground manager, and to supply him with material for supporting the roof of the mine where necessary. The statutory duty of the mineowner is to give necessary support to the roof, and in my opinion it is not an answer to a case of neglect of that duty to say that the employer had delegated the performance of the duty to a competent manager.

I should have come to this conclusion independently of authority, but on a question of such importance, we should wish, if possible, to be guided by authority, and it is satisfactory to know that this is the view of the employer's responsibility that was taken by the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Groves v. Lord Wimborne.[1] The statutory duty there in question was that of providing fencing for dangerous machinery, and it was held that the defence of common employment was not applicable where injury was caused to a servant by the breach of that duty. Lord Justice A. L. Smith, in his opinion, first considers whether the statute can be founded on for any other purpose than that of rendering the employer liable to a penalty, and he comes to the conclusion that, as the statutory provision was passed, not in the interest of the public at large, but for the benefit of workers employed in particular industries, and as the penalty was not to be applied for their benefit, it could not be intended that the provision which imposes a fine as punishment should take away the prima facie right of the workman to be compensated for injury occasioned by that neglect. On this point, the learned Judge quotes with approval the decision of this Court in Kelly v. Glebe Sugar Company.[1]

His Lordship then examines the authorities on the defence of common employment. He says, "In the present case, which is an action founded on the statute, there is no resort to negligence on the part of a fellow-servant or of anyone else. There being an unqualified statutory obligation imposed upon the defendant, what answer can it be to an action for breach of that duty to say that his servant was guilty of negligence, and therefore he was not liable? The defendant cannot shift his responsibility for the performance of his statutory duty on to the shoulders of another person." The other Judges expressed themselves to the same effect.

With regard to the dictum of Lord Chelmsford in Wilson v. Merry & Cuninghame,[2] I agree with Lord Justice Smith that the judgment of the House of Lords only decided that the law as to the effect of common employment, where the fellow-servant was in a position of superintendence, was the same in Scotland as in England, and that Lord Chelmsford's opinion, on the question of statutory duty, not being necessary to the judgment of the House of Lords, is open to reconsideration.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the rule which we granted should now be discharged.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

THIS was an action at the instance of Alexander Turnbull & Company, Limited, Saint Mungo Works, Glasgow, assignees to British patents numbered 3447 and 3994 of the year 1893, against Cruikshank & Fairweather, chartered patent agents, Glasgow, concluding for certain sums of damages for loss sustained through the lapse of the patents.

Alexander Turnbull & Co., Limited v. Cruickshank & Fairweather.

Patent No. 3447 of 1893 was for improvements in steam and low-water safety valves. Patent No. 3994 of the same year was for improvements in stop and other valves.

The pursuers averred that after these patents had been assigned to them, the charge of the patents was entrusted to the defenders; that a distinct branch of the charge of the patents was the duty of intimating from time to time to the pursuers when renewal fees, necessary to keep the patents in force, became payable by the pursuers to the Patent Office, so as to enable the pursuers to make payment of said fees in due time and thus prevent the patents from lapsing; and that for giving such intimation, and for correspondence following thereon, the defenders received a fee of £1, 1s. per annum for each patent. The pursuers further averred that in 1901 the defenders, in breach of the duty undertaken by them, failed to send to the pursuers any notice with reference to the renewal fees payable on said two patents, with the result that the period within which said patents might respectively have been kept in force by payment of the fees, expired without knowledge of the omission reaching the pursuers, and the benefit of the said two patents had consequently been entirely lost to the pursuers, under the provisions of section 17 of the Patents, &c. Act, 1883, and thereby they had sustained heavy loss.

The defenders denied that they were employed to perform the duty of intimating from time to time the dates when renewal fees fell due, or that they undertook the duty of giving such notices in the case of the pursuers' patents. They admitted that after 1900 they gave no notice regarding the renewal fees on said patents, and that the said patents had lapsed, but denied the pursuers' averments as to the loss thereby suffered.

The defenders averred (Ans. 6) that the patent No. 3994 of 1893 was of no value, being invalid. It related to improvements in stop valves for steam-engines, and the devices shewn in the specification relative to the said patent were well known prior to the date of the patent. They set forth in detail patent specifications, prior in date to the pursuers' patent, in which they alleged practically identical devices were contained. The defenders further averred that the patent No. 3447 of 1893 was also invalid, being a mere variation, involving no ingenuity, of a well known form of safety valve, and that the same or similar arrangements of safety valves had been published prior to the date of the pursuers' said patent in a number of British patents, which were set out in detail.

The pursuers in answer averred,—"The pursuers' monopoly, and the validity of their patents, were never previously challenged. The lapsed patents were perfectly valid, and are challenged for the first time in the defences."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The said letters-patent being invalid, the pursuers have sustained no loss through their lapse. (5) In any view, the sum sued for is excessive.

On 3d April 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor in these terms:—"Finds that the statements of the defenders in their answer to article 6 of the condescendence, that the patents number 3447 of 1893, and number 3994 of 1893 are invalid, are irrelevant, and ought not to be remitted to probation: Therefore to that extent sustains the second plea in law for the pursuers; repels the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and before further answer allows the parties a proof of their respective averments in the closed record, and to each a conjunct probation," &c.*

June 23, 1905.

Alexander Turnbull & Co., Limited, v. Cruickshank & Fairweather.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers carry on engineering works in Glasgow, and they are in right of certain patents. The defenders are patent-agents, and acted as agents for the pursuers in regard to patents which the latter held. The pursuers aver that it was part of the duty of the defenders to give notice to them from time to time when renewal fees necessary to keep patents in force became payable to the Patent Office, so that they might make payment of the fees in due time and prevent the patents from lapsing. That duty, the pursuers aver, the defenders failed to perform, in respect that in 1901 they omitted to give notice to the pursuers that fees for two of their patents had become due, in consequence of which the fees were not paid and the patents lapsed. In this action the pursuers claim damages from the defenders for the loss which they have sustained through the lapsing of the patents.

"In their defences the defenders allege that the two patents were invalid for want of novelty, and the question which was argued in the Procedure-roll was whether that is a relevant defence.

"There are two pleas in law, either of which that defence might be regarded as supporting. The one is that the 'letters-patent being invalid, the pursuers have sustained no loss through their lapse,' and the other that 'the sum sued for is excessive.'

"It was practically conceded that the defenders could not be allowed to prove the alleged invalidity of the patents merely for the purpose of reducing the damages, because it would be impossible to estimate the chances of the validity of the patents, if they had not lapsed, ever being challenged. The defenders, however, argued that if they could establish that the patents were invalid, the result would be to shew that the pursuers had not sustained any loss of which the law could take cognisance, through the patents being allowed to lapse, because no one could lawfully make profit out of a patent for an invention which was not entitled to protection.

"I am of opinion that that argument cannot be sustained. It is true that, although letters-patent are not granted as a matter of course, they are always granted at the risk of the patentee, and are liable to be set aside if the requirements of the law have not been complied with. But my understanding of the law is that when letters-patent have been duly sealed and registered, the patentee is entitled to use the patent unless and until it is found to be invalid in an appropriate action. Now, so far as I know, there are only two ways in which the validity of a patent can be challenged. In the first place, the challenge may be made by way of defence to an action of infringement. But in that case, even if the patent is found to be invalid, it is not reduced, but it is still open to the patentee, if the circumstances permit, to cure the defect which has been found to invalidate the patent by amending the specification. The other mode of challenge is by way of reduction of the letters-patent. Unless, however, the pursuer in such an action alleges that the patent was obtained by fraud, or that he was the true inventor, or that he had manufactured or sold the patented article before the date of the patent, he can only sue with the concurrence, on just cause shewn, of the Lord Advocate.

"The way, therefore, in which the defenders in this case seek to have the letters-patent found to be invalid is a novelty. They are in substance seeking to have the letters-patent reduced by way of exception, and without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate. I do not think that that is competent.

"But however that may be, I do not think that the result of the defenders' establishing that the patent was invalid on such grounds as they allege would be that this action would fall to be thrown out. If it had been

No. 142.

June 23, 1905. Alexander Turnbull & Co., Limited, v. Cruickshank & Fairweather.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The averments as to the invalidity of the patents were relevant, as shewing that the pursuers had suffered no loss in consequence of the lapse of the patents. The objections to the validity of the patent were pleadable by the defenders as by any member of the public. A patent right was always open to challenge.[1] An agent defending himself against a claim of damages for an omission was entitled to plead all defences open to him, and it was no bar to say that no one else would have stated similar pleas.[2] It was sought to make the defenders liable for the value of patents alleged to have been lost by their default, and in these circumstances it was right and necessary that the defenders should be permitted to lead evidence as to the value of the patents, which was the measure of the amount of damages. They were entitled to scrutinise whether the patents were good or bad in order to ascertain what the loss of the pursuers had been. If the patents were shewn to be bad, then there had been no loss to the pursuers, and therefore no damages were due. Apart from the invalidity of the patents, their value as pieces of property must be ascertained. In order to this, there must be construction of the specifications; inquiry must be made as to what the patents covered; and the construction of the specifications necessarily opened up the whole question of the value of the patents. In Davidson v. Mackenzie[3] and Stiven v. Watson[4] the question was not as to the value of pieces of property—for a step in diligence, like an inhibition, was not a piece of property. But these patents were incorporeal rights—pieces of property—the inherent value and qualities of which could be ascertained.

Argued for the respondents;—The defence based on the invalidity of the patents was irrelevant, whether put forward to exclude the action or in mitigation of the damages. The patents, at the time of the defenders' breach of duty, were good patents, for nobody had challenged them. Even assuming that there were defects in the patents, the patents remained valid and served their purpose until somebody successfully challenged them,[5] and it was entirely hypothetical whether anyone would have challenged them. The defence in question could averred that the pursuers had obtained or used the letters-patent fraudulently, the case might have been different. But nothing of that sort is suggested. All that is said is that if a number of prior specifications are examined, it will be found that the invention did not possess that novelty which entitled it to protection. Assuming that to be true, I cannot assent to the conclusion for which the defenders contend, that during all the years in which the pursuers have used the patents they must be regarded as having acted dishonestly. Although the Crown does not guarantee the validity of letters-patent, the very object of granting them is that they may be used, and the patentee is, in my judgment, entitled to use them unless and until they are found to be invalid in one or other of the ways recognised by the statutes.

"I am therefore of opinion the defence, in so far as it is rested upon the alleged invalidity of the patents, is not relevant."

exclude the action only if it was shewn that, standing the patents, no gain could have accrued to the pursuers therefrom. It was part of the duty of the defenders, as patent-agents for the pursuers, to protect the validity of the patents against challenge, and the defence stated was contrary to the fiduciary duty of the defenders. Further, the defenders had no title under the statute to impugn the patents.[1] The principle applicable was that a person who had failed to perform a duty could not qualify his own act and escape liability for his non-performance by shewing that loss might possibly have resulted even if he had performed his duty; he must shew that loss would have been certain.[2] Clearly in this case there was, even on the assumption that the patents were open to challenge, no certainty of loss to the pursuers if the defenders had done their duty. In estimating the amount of damages the patents must receive a fair construction on the footing that they were valid, as in fact they were valid at the time of the defenders' default—for no one had challenged their validity.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This reclaiming note raises some puzzling questions, easier to propound than to answer. The action is at the instance of a limited company which held letters-patent for an invention, against a firm of patent-agents, for damages on the ground of negligence. The allegation is that the defenders, having undertaken to do certain things for hire, and amongst others, to keep the pursuers from time to time informed of the dates on which certain payments which, under the regulations of the Patent Office, are necessary in order to keep a patent in force, fell to be made, nevertheless neglected to do so, with the result that the patent lapsed and is no longer of any avail.

There are, of course, denials as to damage that has thereby ensued, and parties are agreed that on this point inquiry is necessary. But a matter of interest has arisen on a special averment of the defenders contained in the answer to article 6 of the condescendence. Their averment is as follows:—They deny the statement that the pursuers have suffered loss and damage, and then proceed to table a large number of specifications prior in date to the pursuers' patent, with the object of shewing that the pursuers' patent was of no value, as it was invalid by anticipation. The meaning which they attach to this is prima facie disclosed by their fourth plea in law, which is,—"The said letters-patent being invalid, the pursuers have sustained no loss through their lapse." The Lord Ordinary in dealing with that plea pronounced the interlocutor now under review, which is as follows:—"Finds that the statements of the defenders in their answer to article 6 of the condescendence, that the patents . . . are invalid, are irrelevant, and ought not to be remitted to probation: Therefore to that extent sustains the second plea in law for the pursuers; repels the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and before further answer allows the parties a proof." We have to determine whether that interlocutor is right.

It is clear from the state of the pleadings, and from certain statements in the Lord Ordinary's note, that the discussion before his Lordship was confined to one, and that the extreme point, that proof should be allowed to shew that the patent was bad, and that, in consequence, no damages at all were due. But before your Lordships the discussion has taken an ampler form, to which I shall revert presently, but the first point was not given up. The first question for us is whether the Lord Ordinary was right in pronouncing the interlocutor he has done upon the plea urged in what I call the extreme sense. I am of opinion that he was. The subject is not free from difficulty, but it has already been under the consideration of the Court. Two authorities were quoted to us, which, in my opinion, are indistinguishable from the present case. I refer to the cases of Davidson v. Mackenzie[1] and Stiven v. Watson.[2] Davidson's[1] was a case in which a person, who had had an inhibition executed, by means of which he sought to secure a preference over a debtor's estate, brought an action against the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions, who, by neglecting to record it, had prevented the inhibition from receiving any effect at all. I think your Lordships will see that this is extraordinarily analogous to the present case on the point I am now dealing with. The action of the Keeper destroyed the life, or, more accurately, prevented the birth, of the inhibition, just as here the action of the defenders destroyed the life of the patent. Accordingly, in so far as the action of the defenders here cut short the life of the patent, it seems to me that there is a perfect analogy between that and Davidson's case.[1] The defence proponed by the defender in Davidson's case[1] was, that even if he had duly recorded the inhibition it would have been of no value, because he was prepared to shew that the inhibition was bad before he got it to record. Here the defenders propose to shew the patent was bad, and therefore worthless. I am aware that in the case of Davidson[1] there was an inquiry, owing to the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, and that therefore there was a double ground of judgment. However, the opinions of the Lord President and Lords Curriehill and Ivory clearly shew that they held that this was not a relevant defence in the mouth of the Keeper of the Register. I think that the bottom of the judgment was this, that after all the inhibition might have served its purpose, even although the defects were there, because it was impossible to say whether they would have been pleaded or not. I am fortified in thinking that the true ground of judgment, because it is clearly brought out in the case of Stiven.[2] This was a case where a person had a right to have certain yarn delivered to him, and being afraid that the yarn might not be delivered to him, he was to get from the persons who were bound to deliver it a certain quantity of tow. It was necessary that the tow should be held in security by a third person, to whom it was delivered. This person neglected to intimate the delivery-order, which had the effect that the property did not pass. The result was that when the bankruptcy ensued the security was lost. The reply of the third person to an action of damages was,—"You cannot get damages from me, because even if I had duly completed the efficacy of the delivery-order by giving intimation to the warehouse, it would have been no use, since your security in my hands would have been reducible under the Bankruptcy Acts." The ratio decidendi is shortly put by Lord Neaves,—"The intention was that Watson should become the agent or mandatory of Stiven. That relation once constituted, a duty arose, and Watson was liable in damages if he failed to perform it, which it is clear that he did. We are now asked on that footing to hold that the agent or servant might turn round and say,—'It would have done you no good if I had performed my duty.' I should have great difficulty in sustaining that defence. It is not a plea to be favoured, and I doubt whether it is relevant, unless, at least, it is demonstrated that the performance of the duty could under no circumstances have been of use to the person for whose benefit it was undertaken." The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—"A somewhat novel plea is urged to the effect that even if the defender had intimated the order, Stiven would have been none the better, as he could not have made use of the security, because it was granted within sixty days of bankruptcy, and might therefore have been set aside by the trustee on Annan's estate. I have no doubt it was a security, and perhaps it might have been challenged with success. But the defender to make his plea plausible must be able to say that it would have been reduced. But how can we tell? The effect of the possession of this tow by the creditor might have been the delivery of the overdue yarns, in which case the other creditors would have had nothing to say." I think these two authorities really settle the matter upon the first point, and therefore, upon the case argued to the Lord Ordinary, I have come to the conclusion, while admitting that it is a difficult case, still without hesitation, that the Lord Ordinary is right.

But when the case came here the argument assumed a wider range. Mr Sandeman saw he might well urge what he wanted in the sense of what I may call mitigation of damages. His argument was this:—"What you have not got through my default is a patent, and I am liable for the necessary results of that. But the value of a good patent and a bad patent is different; and, therefore, just as if you had lost a horse, I should be entitled to prove that he was a bad horse to mitigate the damages, so here I am entitled to prove whether it is a good or a bad patent." This sounds plausible and was well put by Mr Sandeman; but if pressed it is found, I think, to be really the same point over again, because the material point is not the validity or invalidity of the patent, but the chance of someone attacking it. It is not a true analogy with the horse. The difference lies in the nature of the inquiries to shew the value of the horse and the patent. It is clear from the cases I have quoted you could not have excused yourself for the loss of the horse by saying:—"If I had delivered the horse it would have done you no good, because there was a flood in the stable that would have drowned the horse next day." That is the same class of objection as is made here. Accordingly, I think, you really have the discussion, though in somewhat astute form, of the old plea over again.

But Mr Clyde started another argument even more puzzling. He said he wanted to prove the validity or invalidity of the patent for another reason. His argument was this: "Esto I cannot in the proper sense of the word go into the invalidity of your patent. But you are going to sue me for damages. How are you going to fix the value of your patent? You cannot fix it as you do the value of wheat by taking the market value at the time. You can only fix it by finding out what you would have made from it if you had had it. You will begin your inquiry by saying:—'If I had had my patent I should have sold so many valves under it. Not having my patent I cannot sell so many, because other people are now making them. Before they would have been struck at under my patent, and I would have made the valves myself or else obtained a royalty.' Clearly the beginning of the inquiry is to shew what the patent will cover. But," says Mr Clyde, "how am I to find out what the patent will cover unless I am entitled to go into the question of prior specifications, and prove the state of prior knowledge, in order to shew what is the true meaning and construction of the patent." That is ingenious and plausible, but I think there is a way in which it may be solved. In the first place, it might be solved narrowly by saying that there is nothing in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor which prevents Mr Clyde doing what he wishes to do, because the interlocutor is merely that the averments that the patents are invalid are irrelevant and should not be remitted to probation. That would be one way out of the difficulty, but I think it would be a very unfair way to the Lord Ordinary after there has been so much discussion. In the next place, it is quite obvious that the construction of the patents must in one sense be an open question at the proof. Suppose that Mr Macmillan in leading his proof was simply to put in his clients' books and show the turn-over, it is obvious that Mr Clyde would say:—"I want to see the items, because, for all I know, you may be putting in sales not of valves, but of pistons or anything else, and clearly you cannot recover upon these." To come to a less extreme case, if the patent is one for a particular form of valve, say for a needle valve, it is obvious that damages could not be recovered for diminution in the sales of mushroom valves. So in that sense the construction of the patents must be open to proof.

But the construction of the patents must be merely the construction of documents. I am aware it is often said you must construe a patent in what may be called a wider or narrower sense, according to what you may find in prior specifications, or in books, or in view of things that have been formerly used or sold. I do not think that is truly a rule of construction, but that it represents the exigencies of counsel in a case where a patent is being tested. I hold that though the construction is open, the Lord Ordinary and counsel must make the best of it on the documents as they are. I am quite aware this will entail entering into a difficult subject of inquiry. But there are many difficulties in the case arising out of questions of a problematical character—for instance, whether there was a good chance of the invention being superseded by something else. All that is relevant, and I am only pointing out that an inquiry must always be difficult when its domain is in the region not of what is or what was, but of what might have been. But this is the defenders' fault. If they had performed their duty, and had kept the patent alive, we should have had none of these troublesome inquiries to make.

Alexander Turnbull & Co., Limited, v. Cruickshank & Fairweather.

I think the determination of the case should be that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and it would be quite improper in an interlocutor to say anything else. But I think he will consider these further remarks if they seem just to him; and although on the question of construction he will at the proof be entire master of the case, he will give effect to them when the inquiry is taken.

Fee and Liferent—Company—Bonus paid out of reserve fund—Simultaneous issue of new capital equal in amount to the bonus.—When a testator directs or permits part of his estate to remain as shares or stocks in a company which has the power either to distribute its profits as dividends or convert them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested through the testator in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the liferenter, and what is paid by the company to the shareholders as capital or appropriated as an increase to the capital stock of the concern ensures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital.

The directors of a limited company, who had power to divide as dividend part of its reserve fund (accumulated from undivided profits), resolved to divide a portion of its reserve fund among the shareholders in the shape of a bonus of 50 per cent on the amount paid up, and at the same time to increase the capital of the company by issuing, concurrently with the payment of the bonus, preference shares of an amount equal in value to the bonus. A circular was sent to each shareholder intimating the sum to which he was entitled as bonus and the number of preference shares he was entitled to, and enclosing an application form for the new shares. Subsequently warrants for the bonus dividend were sent to the shareholders payable on the day on which payment of the new shares was due.

The trustees of a deceased shareholder, who were directed by the trust-deed to hold certain shares in the company for one person in liferent and for others in fee, took up their quota of the new shares, and applied the bonus in payment thereof.

In a question between the liferenter and fiars of the original shares, held that the operation was a payment of dividend, and not a conversion of profits into capital, and that the liferenter was entitled to have the bonus dividend paid to her.

1ST DIVISION.

EDWARD LAWRENCE IRELAND BLYTH, C.E., who died on 22d November 1902, left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 24th September 1902, whereby he directed his trustees to set apart out of the residue of his estate certain shares, including certain shares in the North British Rubber Company, Limited, and to hold these shares and pay the free income of them for the liferent use allenarly of his daughter, Mrs Edith Louisa Blyth or Milne, and pay the free income thereof to her as an alimentary provision, and to hold the capital of the shares for behoof of her daughter, Olive Gwendoline Milne, in a certain event, and in another event for behoof of his residuary legatees.

The articles of association of the North British Rubber Company, Limited, provided as follows:—(Art. 112) "The directors may, before paying or recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the Company (but subject to the sanction of the Company in general meeting) such sum as they shall think proper as a reserve or sinking fund for equalisation of dividends and contingencies, and the directors shall have power to apply the said sum, at their discretion, to all or any of the said purposes, or to such other purposes as they may deem necessary." (Art. 113) "The directors may invest the sum so set apart as a reserve or sinking fund in such securities and investments as they may see fit, and may vary such securities and investments and dispose of all or any part thereof for the benefit of the Company. They may from time to time divide such reserve fund among the ordinary shareholders rateably according to the amount paid up on their shares."

A special case was presented by the trustees acting under the testator's settlement, first parties; Mrs Edith Louisa Blyth or Milne and her husband, Charles Milne, for his interest, second parties; and Olive Gwendoline Milne and others, residuary legatees under the settlement, third parties.

The case set forth:—"4. On 6th February 1904 the directors of the North British Rubber Company issued a circular letter to the shareholders in the Company* intimating their intention of distri-

* The circular letter was in these terms:—"Your directors find that there is at the credit of reserve fund an amount sufficient to permit them to distribute amongst the ordinary shareholders, in terms of the powers contained in the articles of association, a bonus of 50 per cent to each shareholder on the amount of the shares held by him. They therefore propose that such bonus should be distributed, but as the Company's business has in recent years greatly increased, and as further plant will have to be laid down," &c., "it will be necessary to raise further capital. The directors propose that the capital of the Company should be increased by the creation of 20,000 second preference shares of £12, 10s. each, and that debenture stock for £400,000 should be sanctioned. It is, however, necessary at present to issue only one-half of each class, viz., 10,000 of the second preference shares, and £200,000 of the debenture stock.

"The capital represented by the intended present issue of second preference shares will be £125,000, and equals the total of the bonus of 50 per cent on the ordinary capital. The bonus payable to each shareholder will therefore enable him to meet the price of the preference shares to be offered to him. It is proposed to ask the shareholders to apply for their pro rata proportion of these second preference shares simultaneously with the payment of the bonus.

"These shares will be of £12, 10s. each. . . . They will be issued with £12, 10s. each, or the full amount thereof, payable concurrently with the payment of the bonus, and will therefore be at once fully paid if the shareholders accept the same and apply the amount of the bonus in payment for the shares. . . . The proposed issue would allow of four second preference shares of £12, 10s. each being allotted in respect of every 'A' ordinary share, and one such second preference share of £12, 10s. for every buting among the shareholders a bonus of 50 per cent out of the reserve fund of the Company, and at the same time of increasing the capital of the Company by issuing second preference shares of an amount equal in value to the bonus to be distributed among the shareholders. A special resolution * was passed by the Company on 2d March 1904 approving of this proposal, and on 6th April 1904 the directors issued another circular letter † intimating that they intended to distribute the bonus among the shareholders, but that any shareholder who might apply for an allotment of the new shares in lieu of the bonus would be entitled to a number of shares equivalent in value to the bonus to which he was entitled. The first parties filled up and returned to the Company on 11th April 1904 an application for new shares, and on 13th May 1904 received a notice of dividend, with warrant annexed, for a bonus of £550 appli-

Your directors propose, if the resolutions are passed, that the bonus dividend and the call of £12, 10s. for each new second preference share be made payable on the 15th day of May 1904, the members registered in the Company's books on the 1st day of May 1904 being treated as those entitled to such dividend and to the allotment of new shares. Every holder of ordinary shares in the Company on the 1st day of May 1904 would consequently receive four new second preference shares of £12, 10s. each in respect of every 'A' ordinary share he then holds, and also one new second preference share of £12, 10s. for each 'B' ordinary share he then holds. . . ."

* The special resolution was, inter alia, as follows:—"That the capital of the company be increased by the creation of 20,000 shares of £12, 10s. each, to be called second preference shares. . . .

"That the board shall issue said second preference shares at such time or times, to such persons, and on such terms and conditions, as the board may think expedient."

† Circular letter, dated 6th April 1904:—"The creation of 20,000 preference shares of £12, 10s. each has now been sanctioned.

"The directors have resolved to distribute the bonus of 50 per cent from the reserve fund to the ordinary shareholders of the Company, as intimated in the circular of the 6th of February last.

"In respect of your present holding of.....'A' ordinary shares, and.....'B' ordinary shares in the Company, you are entitled to a bonus of £....., and a warrant for this will be posted to you on the 13th May next.

"The directors are prepared to accept applications for the 10,000 second preference shares now being issued, and you are entitled to an allotment of .....shares.

"Be good enough to fill up, sign, and return the application form enclosed herewith.

"Payment for the second preference shares will be due on the 15th May 1904, when the warrants for the bonus dividend will also be payable.

"The application form must be returned to us completed by 2d May next. Any shareholder failing to do so by that date will be held to have forfeited his right to any allotment of the second preference shares."

With this circular letter was enclosed a "Form of Application for Second Preference Shares" addressed to the directors of the Company in these terms:—"In reply to your circular of 6th April 1904, I beg to apply for .....of the Second Preference Shares of your Company, and I request you to allot me that number of shares, and I hereby agree to accept the same, and to pay the price of £12, 10s. per share on the 15th day of May 1904," &c.

cable to the shares held by them for the said Mrs Edith Louisa Blyth or Milne, one of the second parties, in liferent, and an allotment letter containing a request to pay a sum of £550 to the Company on 15th May 1904 in respect of shares allotted. This payment was duly made by the first parties, and shares were allotted to them accordingly."

The case further stated:—"6. During the life of the testator a reserve fund had been accumulated out of the profits of the Company amounting to £154,320, but between the date of his death and the date of the issue of the above letter no addition had been made thereto. In order to pay the bonus of 50 per cent the directors required to appropriate a sum of £125,000 out of the reserve fund."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"1. Was the said Mrs Edith Louisa Blyth or Milne entitled to the bonus dividend declared and paid by the North British Rubber Company on the shares held by the first parties for her in liferent? and 2. Is she now entitled to have the new shares of said Company, which were purchased with the said bonus dividend, transferred to her absolutely?"

The first and third parties maintained that the Company by issuing the new shares appropriated its profits to capital, or that, at all events, the said bonus was to be regarded, in a question between the second and third parties, as part of the capital of the testator's estate, being payable out of profits accumulated in his lifetime. The second parties maintained that the said new shares were purchased by the first parties with cash paid to them by the Company out of profits accumulated by the Company, and actually distributed to the shareholders in cash, and that the liferentrix was entitled to have the bonus dividend paid over to her, or otherwise to have the new shares which were purchased with the bonus dividend transferred to her absolutely.

Argued for the second parties;—As between the liferentrix and the fiars the bonus fell to be treated as revenue. The bonus was paid out of the reserve fund, which consisted of accumulated profits, and which the directors, by the articles of association, had power to divide from time to time among the shareholders. The trustees, as shareholders, got cash from the Company, and with that cash purchased the new shares. The principles of law governing the question were set forth in Bouch v. Sproule,[1] but the present case was more analogous to the cases where it had been held that there was no conversion.[2] Cunliff's Trustees v. Cunliff[3] was distinguished from the present case in respect that there the new shares were allotted directly to the shareholders. It was true that in Gunnis' Trustees v. Gunnis[4] it was held that the bonus was to be treated as capital, although the shareholders had the option of taking the bonus in new shares or of taking cash; but there was a difference in the form by which the operation in that case was carried through; and, in any event, the decision in that case did not rule the present. The trustees should not have the power, by exercising the option of taking the new shares, to benefit the fiars at the expense of the liferentrix.

Argued for the first and third parties;—The Company had validly, in exercise of its powers, converted the accumulated profits, which formed the reserve fund, into capital, and such exercise of its powers was binding on all persons interested in the shares.[1] The Company had here in substance and fact appropriated the reserve fund as an increase to its capital, the new capital being represented by the new issue of shares paid for out of the reserve fund, and that appropriation by the Company was decisive as between the liferentrix and the fiars. The matter depended on the actings of the Company,[2] and the real nature and effect of the Company's actings in this case was to capitalise the reserve fund. The reserve fund had been, in fact, used in the business as working capital, and was being so used at the time of these transactions. [The Court pointed out that this was not stated in the special case.] Regard must be had to the substance of the transaction rather than to the mere form, and the substance of the transaction was to make into capital the sum previously appearing in the Company's books as reserve fund, and which had been used as capital. In the form in which the operation was carried through, the present case was indistinguishable from Gunnis' Trustees v. Gunnis.[3] In that case, as here, the shareholders were given the option of taking the new shares or taking payment of the bonus in cash, but the Court, looking to the reality of the transaction, and to the circumstance that the Company had used the fund out of which the bonus was paid as working capital, held the bonus to be capital. The Company and everyone else knew perfectly that no shareholder would prefer the option of taking cash rather than the new shares, and no shareholder did so in fact. The whole sum constituting the reserve fund had been accumulated out of the profits of the Company prior to the death of the testator.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case in which your Lordships are asked to determine whether the second or third parties are entitled to a certain sum of money amounting to £550, which arises out of certain operations connected with the North British Rubber Company. The question depends on the terms of the settlement of the late Mr Blyth, and the first parties to the case are his trustees. Mr Blyth's settlement need only be recited to a very limited extent in order to make clear the question which is now before the Court. He made what I may call a special trust of certain shares which were in his possession, and those shares included certain shares in the North British Rubber Company. He directed that the trustees should hold these shares, and pay the free income of them as an alimentary provision to his daughter, Mrs Milne, the second party, and that the capital of the shares should be held in certain proportions for certain other purposes, the third parties being the residuary legatees under the truster's settlement. Now, in 1904, February 6, that is to say after Mr Blyth's death, and when the trustees were vested in the shares, the North British Rubber Company issued a circular letter to their shareholders, and that circular letter forms part of the case. The circular letter begins by a statement that the directors of the North British Rubber Company "find that there is at the credit of the reserve fund an amount sufficient to permit them to distribute amongst the ordinary shareholders in terms of the powers contained in the articles of association, a bonus of 50 per cent to each shareholder on account of the shares held by him." There is no question raised upon the directors' powers in doing so, and I do not think it well could have been raised, because in articles 112 and 113 of the articles of association of the Company, which are also held part of the case, and therefore subject to your Lordships' consideration, there is provision for the establishment of a reserve fund, and there is provision that the directors may from time to time divide such sum among the ordinary shareholders rateably. I think it is quite clear, therefore, that while these directors were entitled to accumulate a reserve fund as they did out of undivided profits, they were not bound to keep it in that state, but they might, if they liked, divide it among the ordinary shareholders, in other words, divide the profits which, up to this moment, they had kept undivided. Now, reverting to the circular letter, the circular letter goes on to say that although they propose to divide this bonus, it is quite clear, in the present state of the Company, that increased capital will be required, and accordingly they make the proposal to the shareholders to increase the capital of the Company by the creation of 20,000 second preference shares of £12, 10s. each, and the creation of debenture stock of £400,000. They indicate at the same time that they do not propose to issue all that capital, but only a half of each class. They then point out that the capital proposed to be issued in preference shares will exactly equal in amount the sum which they propose to distribute by way of bonus, and that accordingly as they intend to offer this capital to the shareholders before offering it to anyone else, each shareholder will find himself by the receipt of his bonus in the position of being able to take up this capital if he so pleases. Of course these proposals as to new capital could not be carried out without special resolutions, and special resolutions were duly promulgated and passed. The final letter following upon this, which is also in the appendix to the case, is a letter of 6th April 1904, and this letter which is addressed to each shareholder individually, is in these terms—(His Lordship read the letter of 6th April 1904, quoted supra, p. 801 note).

The option of this trust to acquire the preference shares was exercised by the trustees, who filled up the application for allotment, and accordingly got an allotment of shares, for which the sum of £550 was due. They, of course, got a warrant or cheque for £550. The two transactions squared each other, and they took the shares. The second party to the case says she is entitled to the £550, being the bonus dividend declared, whereas the third parties to the case contend that that is not so, because this was truly merely a distribution of capital, and that being so the second party has no right to receive part of the capital of this estate. Now, there have been several such questions in cases like this, and we have had a very satisfactory statement of authority from the bar and a discussion upon the same. I do not think it at all necessary to go into the whole series of cases, because at this time of day I do not think there is any doubt as to the doctrine of law that is to be applied to such cases. I think everybody has been content, including the tribunal of highest resort—the House of Lords —everybody has been content with the passage in the judgment of Lord

Justice Fry given originally in the case of Bouch v. Sproule[1] which went to the House of Lords. The passage of Lord Justice Fry, which is quoted with approbation by Lord Herschell, is at page 397 in Bouch v. Sproule,[1] and is in these terms :—"When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stocks in a company which has the power either to distribute its profits as dividend or convert them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life, and what is paid by the company to the shareholders as capital or appropriated as an increase to the capital stock of the concern enures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital." The only point really lies in the application of that doctrine of law to the facts of each particular case. I think it is apparent that necessarily each case must stand upon its own facts, and that, although it is very right and proper to cite other cases in order to pick out the circumstances which the Judges determining these cases may have thought led to the preponderance being on one side or the other, still in one sense no one case is an authority for another. I say that because there was an attempt to say that this case was ruled by the case of Gunnis' Trustees.[2] I do not think any case can really be ruled by the facts of another case, although there may be such similarity as may involve the same train of reasoning in the second case as in the first. I believe that is precisely the way Lord Herschell puts it in that very case of Bouch v. Sproule,[1] which, being a House of Lords case, must be the leading case in that branch of the law. After that passage I have read, Lord Herschell, having commented upon the earlier cases, puts the question thus on page 398 :—"I come now to the question whether the company did in the present case distribute the accumulated profits as dividend, or convert them into capital. And here I find myself constrained to differ from the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal arrived. I think we must look both at the substance and form of the transaction. It is to be observed in the first place that the amount of that portion of the new capital created which was to be paid up was exactly equal to the amount of the profits to be distributed. And it was obviously contemplated, and was I think certain, that no money would in fact pass from the company to the shareholders, but that the entire sum would remain in their hands as paid up capital." I think that is a statement of an issue of fact, which will always arise in each case, and on which the whole matter must be determined. Now, he makes another observation which I think very pertinent. He says,—"We must look both at the substance and form of the transaction," and I think that is so because it is just one of that class of cases where it may very often be that the form really determines the substance. It is quite clear, of course, that there is such a thing as substance behind an independent form. No company could really return its capital to its shareholders merely by calling it dividend. But, on the other hand, if there is a sum of money, as there was here, which it was quite intra vires of the company to use as dividend, or to use for the purpose of creating new capital, then it may very well be that the form will determine what is the true substance of the transaction, which might be either the one or the other. Accordingly, I do not think it particularly material to very narrowly scrutinise, or still less to criticise, results that may have been come to in other cases, to find whether one would have exactly agreed with them or not. But the point is to find what has happened in this case. Now, I confess that in this case I have come to the conclusion that here the Company truly did make payment of a dividend. In the first place, they say so, and in the next place, there is this great testing point in this case, that not only did they have the money, but they gave the money in a way in which you had to go through no process whatever in order to get the cash by the ordinary way in which modern payments are made—namely, by going to a banker and getting a sum of money in exchange for an absolutely negotiable document, because nobody gives money in cash and bags of gold nowadays. I think it is there where you have a contrast with what was done in the case of Bouch v. Sproule.[1] In the case of Bouch v. Sproule[1] it might have been that a shareholder would have said, "I do not want new shares," but unless he had actually cut off his nose to spite his face, the only way in which he could have got the value of his shares would have been to have taken the shares and then have sold them in the market, where they would have had a recognised value. I do not go upon that particularly, but I go upon the fact as determined by the learned Judges that what was really done in Bouch v. Sproule[1] was the creation of new capital, and not the payment of dividend at all. Now, when I look at what was done here, I am driven to the conclusion that what was done was the giving of a dividend, because in the circular letter of 6th April not only are you told that a warrant will be posted to you on 13th May, but you are invited to apply for shares. If you do not apply for shares all that will happen to you will be that you will have forfeited any right to get shares. Accordingly upon the question, which is a pure question of fact, and upon the documents submitted to us, I have come clearly to be of opinion that this Company did as matter of fact pay a dividend in cash, as it was entitled to do, and that being so, upon the doctrine laid down by Lord Justice Fry, I think the second party is entitled to prevail.

Lord Adam.—I perfectly agree with what your Lordship has said upon the law of this case, and I also agree that the case depends upon what view you take of the facts and of what the Company actually did and wished to do in the matter. Now, the question arises very simply. It arises on the will of the late Mr Blyth, who directed his trustees to hold these shares of the North British Rubber Company for a certain party in liferent and for the third parties in fee. It appears that the sum of £550 was paid by the Rubber Company to the trustees under the will, and the question, and the only question, raised in this case is, Is it to be treated as dividend?—if so, there is no question of the second party's right to it,—or Is it to be treated as having been a payment of capital? in which case there is equally no doubt that the third party should prevail. It is obvious that this Company had been very successful, and they desired to increase their capital to a large extent; the mode in which they proposed to carry that out is very clearly set forth in the case. As your Lordship has said, the proposals of the directors of the Company are clearly set out in the circular letter of 6th February 1904. They begin that letter by saying that there is at the credit of the reserve fund an amount sufficient to permit them to distribute among the ordinary shareholders a bonus of 50 per cent. They then say that it is proposed to increase the capital, and they give the reason why. They state how that is to be done. They propose that the capital of the Company should be increased by the creation of 20,000 second preference shares of £12, 10s. each, and by £400,000 of debenture stock; and then they say, it is however necessary at present to issue only one half of each class. Now the question arises about this issue of 10,000 preference shares. It is said that the capital represented by the intended present issue of second preference shares will be £125,000, and equals the total of the bonus of 50 per cent on the ordinary capital. They then say,—"The bonus payable to each shareholder will therefore enable him to meet the price of the preference shares to be offered to him. It is proposed to ask the shareholders to apply for their pro rata proportion of these second preference shares simultaneously with the payment of the bonus." There is no doubt therefore as to the Company desiring to increase their capital, and as to the mode in which they proposed to carry that out. In carrying it out they passed the requisite resolutions setting out the conditions on which such shares should be issued. That was not the creation of fully paid-up shares, which was a mode in which they might have increased their capital if they had thought that the best way. But that was not the way they took. The way they took was this. They had the undisputed right to pay a dividend out of the reserve fund, and they took £125,000 for that purpose, and so having increased their capital by the creation of £125,000 of shares they sent out a circular letter informing the shareholders of this, and say that the directors had resolved to distribute a bonus as mentioned, and that the warrant would be posted on 13th May next. That is the history so far of this matter relating to the bonus. In the notice with the dividend warrant sent out on 13th May it is stated that the dividend was declared on 30th March, this following on the passing of the requisite resolutions declaring a dividend of 50 per cent on the share capital. Now, ex facie of that proceeding that appears to me to be a declaration—a perfectly valid declaration of a dividend of 50 per cent per share. There is no question of their power to do so, because, as your Lordship pointed out, they have special power to pay a dividend out of the reserve fund if they so pleased. That was not a bogus arrangement, because it is perfectly clear that having declared a bonus payable on 13th May 1904 they sent the amount of the bonus due to each shareholder of the Company who was entitled to it. They sent to each of them and made actual payment of the bonus to each of the shareholders. It humbly appears to me that unless there is something to render that proceeding invalid, or to shew that that proceeding should not be carried out, that that is a declaration of a dividend. Now, what is said is that that is not so. It is said that the directors intended to increase their capital. There is no doubt that is so. I have no doubt, by making payment of the bonus and payment of the allotted shares simultaneous, that they hoped and expected that the shareholders would consent and agree to take up the allotted shares. But the question occurs to me, where is there anything illegal in that, where is there anything to render it invalid? The shareholders were perfectly free to do as they liked in that matter; they had the matter in their own hands. They might have gone to the bank next day and got the money in exchange for the dividend warrant. There was no obligation upon them to take the shares. It is perfectly true that they got notice in the circular letter of 6th April that the directors proposed to increase the capital, and they enclosed an application form, and they told them that the application must be returned by 2d May next. That was before the dividend was actually paid. What were the consequences if they refused to take up the application? Not that they were not to get the dividend, but that they would be held to have forfeited any right to an allotment. There is nothing in that that I can see to render the thing invalid. I agree with your Lordship that each case must turn upon its own facts, and looking to the actual facts in this case, and to what the directors did, I see no reason to suppose that this was not a valid declaration of dividend. The directors might have increased their capital by the issue of fully paid-up shares, but for good reasons of their own they did not take that course. Possibly they thought that a number of shareholders might think they had shares enough. However that may be, I see nothing in the course they took to make the declaration of the dividend not a valid one. For these reasons I agree with your Lordship, and I think the questions should be answered accordingly.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have had some difficulty in this case, because I think if we could look at all the probabilities there might be a great deal of force in Mr Blackburn's argument that the substance of this transaction was intended to be, and was, to convert the undivided profits into paid-up capital upon newly created shares. But then, we are not only not at liberty to speculate upon the probabilities, which is always a hazardous process, and I think we are precluded by the form of process adopted by the parties even from drawing inferences of fact from the facts stated by the parties themselves, because this question is before us in the form of a special case, and by statute that is competent only when the parties interested in the question of law are agreed upon the facts and dispute only upon the law. And accordingly we are in the habit of taking, and I think we are bound to take, the statement of facts upon which parties are agreed, not only as an exact and accurate statement, but as an exhaustive statement of all the facts which by the contract of parties are to be deemed to be relevant, and are to be taken into account in the consideration of the question of law. Now, upon the question of law which arises in the case, I think the principle must be taken as finally decided in the words which your Lordship in the chair quoted from Lord Justice Fry, because the learned Judge's statement of principle has been cited and approved by the House of Lords in the case of Bouch v. Sproule.[1] And it comes to this, that when a testator directs that part of his estate shall remain as shares or stocks in a company, which has power either to distribute its profits as dividend or to convert them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of power by the company is binding upon all persons interested in it, and consequently what is paid as dividend by the company goes to the liferenter, and what is appropriated as increased capital goes to the persons interested in the capital. That is the doctrine of law upon which the question put to us must be decided. The only further question of law which might be raised upon that statement, and was raised by Mr Blackburn, was whether that doctrine could apply to profits accumulated during the lifetime of the testator, and therefore accumulated before the liferent interest created by his will had begun. But then I think that difficulty is met by Lord Watson in the case of Bouch v. Sproule.[1] He says that the rule must obtain whether the profits with which the company is dealing belong to the current year or have been previously reserved for the purposes of the company's business. The question therefore between the parties appears to me to resolve, the moment the law has been ascertained, as I think it is, by this authoritative statement, into a mere question of fact. Whether the accumulated profits in question have been paid as dividend, or whether they have been converted into paid-up capital upon newly created shares—upon that question of fact I have come to agree with your Lordships, for the reasons which have been already stated, and which I do not think it necessary to repeat. I only observe what appears to me to be conclusive on the one side, and that is that the Company did pay in money, or in what is equivalent to money, the £550 now in question as dividend upon existing shares. They issued to the shareholders a dividend warrant in perfectly clear and explicit terms, which is equivalent to a cheque, which could have been taken to the bank, and upon which the money must have been recovered. All that is equivalent to paying a dividend in money. It appears to me, therefore, that it is established by the agreement of parties as to the facts that the Company did in fact pay this sum of £550 as dividend. Now, the argument upon the other side came to this, that notwithstanding that payment it must be held that in substance the transaction was the conversion of the profits into capital upon two main grounds. In the first place, Mr Blackburn said these accumulated profits were de facto part of the floating capital of the Company, because they were used as part of the capital from the time when the profits were first reserved for the purposes of the Company's business. Secondly, he said that it was known to the Company, and was apparently found in fact, that no shareholder would refuse his shares and prefer to take the money as dividend, and in point of fact probably no shareholder did. Now, these are considerations of fact which might or might not have weight if we were balancing equally well proved facts against one another, but the observation I make upon them is that they are not to be found in the special case. They are statements of fact only, and I decline to draw from what is stated any inference to the effect that the undivided profits were used as part of the floating capital of the Company. That may or may not be, but it is a matter of fact, which, if either of the parties intended to found upon it, it was necessary to put to the other party and obtain his agreement to its being stated. Therefore I think we must exclude from consideration all argument based upon inferences of fact which are not to be found in the special case itself. We know nothing except what is set forth in explicit terms by the parties themselves. From what is so set forth I can gather nothing except that this £550 in dispute was paid as dividend, and therefore it belongs to the party having interest in the dividend accruing to the shareholders, and not to the party interested in the capital stock of the Company.

Succession—Testament—Revocation—Special Destination of Heritage—Subsequent General Disposition.—In 1898 and 1902 A purchased with moneys belonging to himself certain heritable properties, taking the titles which were registered, "to and in favour of the said A and B, wife of and residing with the said A, and to the survivor of them, and to their heirs and assignees whomsoever."

A died in July 1904 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated April 1904, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including all means and estate over which he had power of disposal by will or otherwise. The purposes were to pay the liferent of the whole residue to his widow, burdened with an obligation to maintain and educate the children, and the fee to the children on the liferenter's death. Power was given to the trustees (1) to encroach upon capital if the income was insufficient for the maintenance of the widow and children, and (2) to sell and burden heritage.

At his death the testator had personal estate of the value of £3337. The heritable properties above mentioned were valued at £4900. The testator had no other heritable property. He was survived by a widow and by eight children, two in pupilarity and four in minority.

Held that the settlement, read in the light of the circumstances, shewed the testator's intention to evacuate special destinations of the heritable properties, and that the settlement had this effect.

2D DIVISION. ROBERT MORRISON, paperhangings manufacturer, Glasgow, died on 22d July 1904, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, and survived by his wife, Mrs Sarah Elizabeth Gaw or Morrison, and by eight children of the marriage, of whom four were in minority and two in pupilarity.

Mr Morrison had, in 1898 and 1902, purchased three heritable properties, taking the destinations in favour of himself and his wife as shewn below,* and in January 1905 a special case was presented for determination of the question whether these special destinations had been evacuated by Mr Morrison's trust-disposition and settlement, which was dated 14th April 1904.

By the trust-disposition, Mr Morrison, "for the settlement of the succession to my means and estate," disponed and made over to trustees for the purposes after mentioned, "All and Sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of every kind and description and wheresoever situate, that shall belong to me at the time of my death, including therein all means and estate over which I have power of disposal by will or otherwise; together with the writs and vouchers of the same."

The purposes were (Firstly) payment of debts, &c.; "(Secondly) I direct my trustees to hold and apply the residue of my means and estate for behoof of my wife in liferent, for her liferent use only, during all the days and years of her life, burdened with the suitable maintenance, education, and upbringing of such of my children as may at my death be unable to maintain themselves; and I provide that in the event of my trustees being of opinion at any time that the income of my estate is insufficient for the comfortable maintenance of my said wife and that of any of my children who may be unable to support themselves, they shall have power from time to time to encroach upon and pay to her for that purpose part of the capital of my estate, and that to such extent as they deem proper; (Thirdly) On the death of my said wife, or on my own death should she predecease me, I direct my trustees to hold and apply, pay and convey, the residue of my means and estate equally to and among my whole children, payable and to be conveyed to them as they respectively attain twenty-one years of age after the death of their mother," with a conditional institution of issue, and a clause of survivorship for the event of any child dying before the period of payment.

The trust-disposition further provided: "And to enable my trustees to carry out the purposes of this settlement, and of any codicils thereto, I confer upon them all requisite powers, and particularly solicitor in Glasgow, and his wife, conform to disposition granted by them, dated 16th, and, with warrant of registration thereon on behalf of Mr Morrison and his wife, recorded in the Register of Sasines 17th May 1898, whereby they, in consideration of £200 paid to them by Mr Morrison, and of his freeing and relieving them of £650, being the balance of a bond and disposition in security affecting the property, sold and disponed the said villa "to and in favour of the said Robert Morrison and Sarah Gaw or Morrison, wife of and residing with the said Robert Morrison, and to the survivor of them, and to their heirs and assignees whomsoever"; (2) a tenement of dwelling-houses in Dennistoun, Glasgow, the title to which consisted of a feu-contract, dated 15th and 17th, and, with warrant of registration thereon on behalf of Mr Morrison and his wife, and the survivor of them, recorded in the Register of Sasines 24th January 1902, entered into between the trustees of the deceased Alexander Dennistoun of Golfhill, of the first part, and Mr Morrison and his wife, of the second part, by which Dennistoun's trustees sold, alienated, and in feu-farm disponed the said subjects "to and in favour of the said Robert Morrison and Mrs Sarah Elizabeth Gaw or Morrison, and the survivor of them, and his or her heirs and their, his, or her assignees whomsoever"; and (3) tenement of dwelling-houses in Langside, Glasgow, the title to which consisted of a feu-contract, dated June 1902, in terms, mutatis mutandis, similar to the immediately preceding title.

(but without prejudice to the said generality) power, without incurring any personal liability, to retain unrealised and unaltered for such period as they may see fit, any investments, securities, or property that may be held by me at the date of my death, or any part thereof; and also to borrow money on the security of my heritable estate, and to grant bonds and dispositions in security or other necessary deeds for the sums so borrowed; and also to sell my heritable estate in such lots, at such prices, and with such warrandice as they may think proper; and also (and in addition to the powers of investment conferred upon trustees by statute) from time to time" to lend out or invest the trust funds on certain specified classes of security.

The case set forth the following facts:—Mr Morrison left personal estate valued at £3337, 8s. 2d., exclusive of policies of insurance on his life payable to his widow of the value of £674, 12s. 6d. The three heritable properties above mentioned were valued in all at £5550, burdened with a bond and disposition in security for £650 over one of them, the Cambuslang property, leaving the net value of £4900. Mr Morrison had no other heritable property. In the case of each of the three properties the price or cost of building was paid by Mr Morrison out of his own funds. The bond and disposition in security for £650 was held by his wife, and the loan was given from her own funds.

The first parties to the case were the trustees under Mr Morrison's trust-disposition and settlement; the second party was Mrs Morrison the widow; and the third parties were the children of the marriage, with the tutors or curators of such of them as were in pupilarity or minority.

The second party maintained that she, being the survivor of the spouses, under the several special destinations in the titles, was now absolute proprietrix of the three heritable properties to the exclusion of the first and third parties. Alternatively, she maintained that the heritable properties were vested in fee, jointly and in equal shares, in her late husband and herself, and that if the trust-disposition and settlement applied to these properties, it conveyed only that one-half pro indiviso share thereof in which the truster was vested, and that the second party was therefore vested in the fee of the properties to the extent of the other one-half pro indiviso.

The first and third parties maintained that the conveyances of the heritable properties, so far as conceived in favour of the second party were revocable by the truster as donations inter virum et uxorem; that these special destinations were evacuated by the conveyance contained in the trust-disposition and settlement, and particularly by the conveyance of "all means and estate over which I have power of disposal by will or otherwise"; and that the said heritable properties fell to be wholly administered by the first parties as part of the trust-estate.

The questions of law were;—"(1) Is the second party, in virtue of the special destinations in the titles to the heritage, (a) proprietrix of the whole of these several properties; or (b) proprietrix of one-half thereof? or (2) does the said trust-disposition and settlement evacuate the special destinations in the titles and convey (a) the whole of said several properties, or (b) one-half thereof, to the first parties to be administered by them as part of the trust-estate?"

Argued for the first and the third parties;—The destinations in the titles of these three heritable properties were revocable by Mr

Morrison as being donations inter virum et uxorem. The only donation stante matrimonio by a husband to his wife which was irrevocable was one which made a reasonable provision for her, in the whole circumstances, to take effect only on her survivance of her husband.[1] Here it could not be said that an absolute conveyance of the husband's whole heritage to his wife was no more than a reasonable provision. Being therefore sua natura revocable, had these special destinations been revoked? Where the special destination was taken by the testator himself, it might be that the presumption was against revocation or evacuation, but in considering whether the special destination had been evacuated, the Court was entitled to look not merely at the deeds, but at the whole circumstances.[2] Here the settlement conveyed to the trustees all the means and estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to the testator at the time of his death, "including therein all means and estate over which I have power of disposal," which seemed very apt language to carry these specially destined properties. Then the power conferred on the trustees to encroach on capital, and the powers of selling and burdening the heritage, and generally the whole provisions of the settlement, were almost meaningless if the widow took the whole heritage as her own absolute property and only the moveables were carried into the trust. In the whole circumstances the special destinations had been evacuated.

Argued for the second party;—The second party admitted that it was within her husband's power to evacuate or revoke these special destinations, as being donations inter virum et uxorem. The question was, Had he done so? Where the special destination was taken by the testator himself as here, and was not a subsisting destination under which he himself had succeeded, there was a strong presumption against evacuation by a subsequent settlement in general terms; the principle was that the special destination being in effect a testamentary deed by the testator was not to be held as revoked by the subsequent settlement unless it was (1) either revoked per expressum, or (2) the two deeds were incompatible, in which case the settlement as the later deed prevailed. It was a question how far extrinsic evidence was admissible to overcome this presumption against evacuation. Certainly the Court were entitled to look at the facts in view of which the testator presumably made his settlement, but it rather appeared that direct extrinsic evidence of intention was inadmissible.[3]

Morrison's Trustees v. Morrison.

In the present case, however, it was sufficient that the deeds, read in the light of all the circumstances disclosed in the special case, did not infer an intention to evacuate. The second party's contention involved that she got the whole heritage and a liferent of the moveables, leaving only the fee of the moveables at her death to the children. That might seem rather an unequal division, but to proceed on that ground was not to proceed on evidence, but on the bare conjecture that the testator could not have intended such an unequal division. The general conveyance of all heritable property to the trustees was a condition of the question arising, not a solution of it. There was no doubt added the words "including therein all means and estate over which I have power of disposal by will or otherwise," but similar words occurred in the case of Currie,[1] where the special destination was held not to be evacuated, a proof of circumstances being refused. The clauses in the settlement giving the trustees power of dealing with heritage were inserted to provide for contingencies, e.g., the contingency of Mrs Morrison predeceasing her husband, or of the acquisition by him of other heritage with a general destination in the titles. In any view, there could not be evacuation as regarded one-half of these three properties, for under the recorded titles the second party was vested in a one pro indiviso half of each, and to that one-half the settlement did not apply.[2]

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The success of the second party's contention would mean that the testator, having a wife and eight children and an estate to dispose of among them, with £4900 in heritage and £3337 in personalty, so dealt with it as to give his widow a right of fee in the whole heritage (as well as in £674 of insurances on his life), besides a liferent of the whole personalty, under burden of maintaining and educating such of the children as might at his death be unable to maintain themselves, thereby leaving to the eight children only the fee of the moveable estate at the widow's death. Such a division among widow and children is not perhaps a very likely one for a testator to make. But the widow has in her favour a certain presumption of law that a general settlement by a testator will not evacuate any special destination which he himself has previously made. And the question here is whether the provisions of Mr Morrison's general settlement, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, are sufficient to overcome that presumption. In my opinion they are, for the following reasons:—(1) The conveyance to trustees is of Mr Morrison's whole estate, heritable and moveable, including therein all means and estate over which he had power of disposal by will or otherwise—a description which seems to apply to the three house properties which in 1898 and 1902 had been bought with his own money, but the titles to which he had taken to himself and his wife and the survivor, and to their heirs and assignees whomsoever. There was no other property to which the description could apply, and these destinations were undoubtedly revocable as being quoad one-half of the fee donations inter virum et uxorem and quoad ultra destinations of the truster's property admittedly testamentary. (2) The total liferent given to his widow after paying debts and expenses, although not absolutely inconsistent with a fee to her of the heritage, is much more consistent with an intention to limit her to a liferent of his whole estate, both heritable and moveable. This view is, I think, strengthened by the power given to the trustees to encroach upon capital in the event of their being of opinion at any time that the income was insufficient for the comfortable maintenance of the widow and that of the children, who might be unable to support themselves, for encroachment could hardly be required if the widow besides having the liferent of the moveable estate was also intended to have the fee of the heritable estate. (3) Express power is also given to the trustees to deal with heritage, both by selling and burdening, and there would be no heritage either to sell or burden if it all went to the widow.

I do not think that, in point of practical result, any distinction can be drawn between the whole and the half of the properties specially destined. Either the widow, as the survivor of the spouses, is entitled to the whole, or the destinations in the titles are completely evacuated. I am in favour of answering the questions in the case to the latter effect.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD KYLLACHY, and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question of law therein stated in the negative: Answer the first alternative of the second question therein stated in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

1st Division.

THIS was a special case brought for the determination of questions arising with regard to certain heritable subjects formerly belonging to the late John Smith, portioner, Bridgeton, Glasgow, who died on 10th November 1847, leaving a disposition and deed of settlement, dated 3d September 1847, which disposed of the subjects in question.

The facts of the case and the contentions of the parties appear from the opinion of the Lord President.

The parties to the special case were (1) the testamentary trustees of John Smith, a son of the testator; (2) the testamentary trustees of Andrew Smith senior, a son of the testator; (3) the testamentary trustees of Andrew Smith junior, the eldest son of Andrew Smith senior; (4) Cochran Barr Cross, the son of Jean Smith or Cross, a daughter of the testator; and (5) Andrew Smith tertius, eldest son of Andrew Smith junior.

The present and past state of the family, and the connection between the parties and the testator, are shewn in the genealogical tree subjoined in note infra.*

The Court did not answer the questions of law stated in the case, and for the purposes of this report it is not necessary to refer to them further.

The questions of law argued by the parties were (1) whether a destination over of heritage in a marriage-contract to the heirs of the wife failing children of the marriage was merely a conditional institution or a substitution, and if a substitution whether the heirs of the wife were to be sought as at the death of the wife, or as at the date of the failure of children of the marriage; (2) whether the words "survivors or survivor" in a destination over of heritage to the heirs of the bodies of the survivors or survivor of certain of the testator's children were to be read as "others or other," and if so to be read whether the heirs of the body of the others or other were to be sought as at the death of each or as at the death of the last survivor; (3) whether in a destination of heritage to two of the testator's children

LORD PRESIDENT.—The present case arises out of the testamentary arrangements of the late Mr John Smith. The points raised are not either of very great difficulty or importance at law, but the whole case is involved in no inconsiderable complexity, arising from the fact that there are four different subjects in dispute which are contended for by five different persons, and their various contentions are represented to your Lordships by no fewer than fifteen questions.

Under these circumstances I think it will conduce to lucidity if I take the subjects in dispute one by one. The subjects in dispute are all various parts of a heritage which was left by Mr Smith under a scheme of very elaborate destinations contained in his settlement.

The present and past state of the family, which it is necessary to understand in order to apply the provisions of the settlement, is most conveniently made out by referring to the genealogical tree, which is made part of the case.

Subjects IV.—The destination of this subject is in these terms:—"In the fourth place, I do hereby give, grant, assign, dispone, convey, and make over from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of Ann Smith, my youngest daughter, and the heirs whomsoever of her body, whom failing to the heirs of the bodies respectively of the said John Smith, Andrew Smith, Jean Smith, and Alexander Smith, my other children, in the proportion of one-fourth to the heirs of each, and in case of the death of any of the said John Smith, Andrew Smith, Jean Smith, and Alexander Smith without issue, or that the children of any of them should fail, then to the heirs of the bodies of the survivors or survivor of the said John, Andrew, Jean, and Alexander Smiths, and their heirs, successors, and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole" Subjects IV.

Under this destination Ann, who survived her father, took these subjects, which she conveyed by a marriage-contract entered into between her and John Burnside, who became her husband. In the case as stated by some of the parties it was contended that the marriage-contract was not valid in respect that it had not been entered into with consent of her curators-nominate, she being at the time a minor, but as the curators never acted, this plea was not insisted upon before your Lordships. The said marriage-contract forms part of the case. It dealt with the property specially conveyed to Ann, mentioned as subjects No. IV., which it disponed to "and in favour of the children of the said intended marriage equally among them, share and share alike, whom failing, to the heirs and assignees of me the said Ann Smith in fee."

Ann Smith or Burnside died survived by one child, Jane Burnside, who accordingly took under this destination.

Jane Burnside died in infancy and necessarily intestate, her heir-at-law being her father, John Burnside, who is still alive. John Burnside, as heir of his daughter, and in respect of the interest he had through the marriage-contract in properties left by his father-in-law, disponed to his two brothers-in-law John and Andrew Smith and his sister-in-law Jean Smith. The first question that arises, therefore, with regard to these subjects depends upon the meaning and import of the destination in the marriage-contract. If the destination over in favour of the heirs and assignees of Ann Smith on failure of the children of the marriage is only a conditional institution, or if being a substitution the heirs and assignees of Ann Smith are to be sought as at the date of the death of Ann Smith, then in either of these two cases the property passed to Burnside and was carried by his disposition, the parties presently in right under that disposition being the testamentary trustees of John, the first parties, the testamentary trustees of Andrew primus, the second parties, and Mr Cross, the fourth party, who is the heir of his deceased mother, Mrs Cross, who died intestate. If, on the other hand, the clause in question being a substitution, the heirs of Ann are to be sought at the date of the failure of the children of the marriage, that is to say, at the date of Jane Burnside's death, then the heir of Ann at that date was her elder brother Andrew primus—Alexander being already dead—but he having never served, and not having survived the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the heir has come to be Andrew Smith junior, who survived the Act of 1874, and in whose rights are his testamentary trustees, the third parties. Upon this question I am in favour of the latter view, being of opinion that the case is ruled by a case not cited before us, Kirkwood v. Keeling.[1] See also Lord M'Laren's book, sec. 1388.

Subjects V.—The clause dealing with these subjects is in these terms:—"In the fifth place, I do hereby give, grant, assign, dispone, convey, and make over from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of Alexander Smith, my youngest son, and the heirs whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to the heirs of the bodies respectively of the said John Smith, Andrew Smith, Jean Smith, and Ann Smith, my other children, in the proportion of one-fourth to the heirs of each, and in case of the death of any of the said John Smith, Andrew Smith, Jean Smith, and Ann Smith without issue, or that the children of any of them should fail, then to the heirs of the bodies of the survivors or survivor of the said John, Andrew,

[1] March 5, 1842, 4 D. p. 878, 14 Scot. Jur. 327.

Jean, and Ann Smiths, and their heirs, successors, and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole" Subjects V.

Alexander died in 1853, childless and intestate, and accordingly, the portion of the destination came into effect which devolves the share on the heirs of the body respectively of his brothers and sisters. At that time his brothers and sisters were alive, so that matters were in suspense till it came to be seen who answered the description of the heirs of the body of the various brothers and sisters. As regards two of them there is no question. Jean died in 1864, and after her death of course the fourth party became the heir of her body. He therefore obviously takes one-fourth, which, for purposes which will become evident, I will call three-twelfths of Alexander's share. Andrew died in 1873 survived by Andrew Smith junior, who in the same way thereupon took the share, and as he survived 1874 his testamentary trustees, the third parties, are now in right of his original three-twelfths. Ann died in 1855 survived by one child, Jane Burnside. She served as heir of provision to her uncle, Alexander, and thereby became vested in her share, but as she died in infancy she was unable to evacuate the destination, and accordingly her share passed on to the heirs of the body of the others. In substituting the word "others" for "survivors," I am not throwing any doubt on the general principle that survivors must prima facie receive its natural meaning. But in the present case I think it must mean "others,"—a result which has already been arrived at in cases like that of Ramsay's Trustees,[1]—because in all the cases in which "survivor" received its natural meaning, there is always somebody who either as survivor takes or indicates the person who at that moment can take (e.g. issue of the survivor). But to say that a property is to go to the heirs of the body of the survivor at the time of the opening of the succession is obviously a contradiction in terms. One-twelfth therefore of Jane Burnside's three-twelfths goes in the same way as before to the third party, and one to the fourth party, while the third is hung up for the eventual determination of who are the heirs of the body of John. John died in 1898 without issue, and therefore with no heirs of the body. Following the same process of reasoning as before, his original three-twelfths plus one-twelfth, being the part of Jane Burnside, is divided into two-twelfths each to the third and fourth parties, the result being in toto that the third and fourth parties divide the subject equally between them.

Subjects VI.—The destination regulating these subjects is as follows:—"In the sixth place, I do hereby give, grant, assign, dispone, convey, and make over from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said Ann Smith and Alexander Smith, equally between them, or share and share alike, and their foresaids, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole," Subjects VI.

The question here is as to the meaning of "their foresaids," whether that applies to heirs of the body, or whether it imports the longer destination introduced by the words "whom failing," in the description of Subjects IV. and V. respectively. Ordinarily speaking I would be of the opinion that "their foresaids" was limited to that class of heirs connected with the original disponee by the word "and," and not to the longer catalogue introduced by the words "whom failing," but I am driven to the conclusion that this testator did not so use it, because he uses the words "their foresaids" in obviously the larger sense in the obligation to infeft and in the procuratory of resignation. That being so, Ann's share follows the fate of Subjects IV., and Alexander's share follows the fate of Subjects V.

I propose therefore to your Lordships that we should say that in the opinion and judgment of the Court the subjects fall to be divided as follows:—

Subjects IV.—To the third parties.

Subjects V.—One-half to the third parties, and one-half to the fourth party.

Subjects VI.—Three-fourths to the third parties, and one-fourth to the fourth party:

and that it is unnecessary to answer the fifteen questions as put.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which has been delivered by the Lord President, and I concur in it.

No. 146.

Pringle v. Carron Co.
2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

IN May 1904 William Pringle, the proprietor of a plot of ground, with a dwelling-house thereon, in the parish of Grangemouth, Stirlingshire, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk against Carron Company, for decree for £110 as damages to his house and ground caused by the defenders' working of the coal underneath.

The defenders, who did not deny that their workings had caused damage to the pursuer's ground and buildings, pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The defenders having been entitled under their titles and the minute of agreement founded on to work their coal so as to withdraw support from the surface of the pursuer's ground and buildings, without incurring any liability for damage, are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The pursuer being, under his titles, excluded from claiming damage due to subsidence caused by defenders' mineral workings, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The deeds on which these pleas were founded were three, viz.:—

(1) A contract of excambion, dated 18th and 23d December 1854, and registered in the Register of Entails, 29th June, and in the Books of Council and Session, 17th August, 1857. By this deed the eleventh Duke of Hamilton disponed to Carron Company the coal under certain lands belonging to His Grace, including the coal under the lands afterwards (in 1898) feued to the pursuer, "with all right, title, and interest, present and future, of the said Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, in the said coals, . . . hereby disponed by him, and all right competent to the said Duke with reference to the working of the said coals"; and the defenders Carron Company on their part alienated and in excambion disponed to the Duke, in terms, mutatis mutandis, identical, the coal under certain lands belonging to the Company.

(2) A minute of agreement, dated November 1889, and not registered in any way, by which the twelfth Duke of Hamilton, first party, and the defenders Carron Company, second parties, consented that the coal in their respective properties, which had been conveyed to the other party by the contract of excambion, should be worked "by the longwall system, or any other process of complete excavation conducted in a regular and workmanlike manner, notwithstanding that such method of working may have the effect of lowering the surface of said lands." The parties agreed in respect of this consent to pay to each other a lordship on the coal respectively worked by them. The minute of agreement further provided:—"(Fifth) The royalties above provided to be paid to the first and second parties respectively shall be in full of and include all claims competent to them for damage that may be caused to the surface of their said respective lands by their respective mineral workings, including any claims competent to them in respect of the lowering of the surface or dislocation of any of the mineral strata by the extraction of the coal, but excluding" damage to existing dwelling-houses, &c., "and so long as the said royalties shall be punctually paid when due the parties shall free and relieve each other of their respective claims therefor, and for damage to the drains or crops on their respective lands which may be from time to time caused by said coal workings."

(3) The pursuer's title was a feu-disposition by the testamentary trustees of the twelfth Duke of Hamilton in favour of the pursuer, dated 6th December 1898, and recorded 18th January 1899. By this feu-disposition the testamentary trustees of the twelfth Duke feued out to the pursuer the plot of ground in question, "but excepting and reserving always to the said trustees, and their successors in the ground hereby disponed, all ironstone, coal, fireclay, marble, shale, and limestone, and all mines, metals, minerals, and stone of every description which may be found in and under the ground hereby disponed, with power to the said trustees and their foresaids, and their tacksmen, or others in their name, to work, win, and carry away the said minerals and other substances hereby reserved, and to do everything necessary for working, winning, and carrying away the same, except that they shall not be entitled to sink pits in the ground hereby disponed; and in the event of any loss or damage being caused to the ground hereby disponed, or to the buildings erected or to be erected thereon, or to the water with which the same may be supplied, or to the drainage thereof, or in any other manner of way, by or through the past or future workings of the said ironstone, coal, fireclay, marble, shale, and limestone, or other metals, minerals, or stone, under or near the ground hereby disponed, no claim for damage or recompense shall on such account lie or be competent to my said disponee or his foresaids against the said trustees or their foresaids, or their tacksmen, or other persons deriving right from them." At the date of the feu-disposition the plot of ground was not built upon, but the pursuer afterwards, in terms of the obligations of the feu-disposition, erected the dwelling-house in question.

On 29th July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Russell Bell) repelled the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defenders, and allowed to the parties a proof as to the amount of damage caused by the workings of the defenders to the pursuer's subjects. Thereafter a remit to an architect to ascertain the amount of damage was made of consent (all other questions being reserved), and subsequently decree for the amount so ascertained was pronounced in favour of the pursuer.

The defenders Carron Company appealed.

On 23d December 1904 the trustees of the twelfth Duke of Hamilton lodged a minute in which they stated that the defenders Carron Company had intimated to the minuters that they claimed to be relieved (in virtue of the agreement of 1889) by the minuters of whatever sums the pursuer might be found entitled to in the present action. The minuters accordingly prayed to be sisted as compearing defenders in the action. On 20th January 1905 an interlocutor was pronounced sisting the minuters as compearing defenders, and they adopted the defences of the defenders Carron Company.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer was not entitled to surface damages from the defenders. The pursuer did not acquire a right to surface support, because in 1854 the eleventh Duke had conveyed the right to bring down the surface to Carron Company. By the contract of excambion of 1854 the eleventh Duke conveyed to the Company not only the coal, "but all right competent to the said Duke with reference to the working of the said coal"; and as the Duke, prior to that conveyance, undoubtedly had right himself to work the coal so as to bring down the surface, he must be held to have conveyed that right to the Company by the contract of excambion. In any view, the pursuer's own title—the feu-disposition of 1898—excluded his present claim. That feu-disposition expressly declared that the pursuer should have no claim to damages from injury to the surface against the trustees or persons "deriving right from them." The present claim was practically a claim against the trustees, because the Company had a right of relief against the trustees; in any view the Company were persons "deriving right" from the trustees, since under the agreement of 1889 the Company derived right from the twelfth Duke, whom the trustees represented. The effect of the agreement of 1889 was to create a servitude in favour of the Company.[1] If the trustees were even now to grant a letter of authority to the Company empowering the Company to bring down the surface that would be sufficient to exclude this claim, looking to the terms of the pursuer's title.

Argued for the pursuer;—The contract of excambion of 1854 did not give the Company right to bring down the surface. "All right competent to the said Duke with reference to the working of the said coal" merely gave the Company such rights as the Duke would have had had he been the owner of the coal but not of the surface. The right of surface support was one of the natural rights of property in land, and any derogation from it must appear in the surface owner's own title.[2] There was no such derogation in the pursuer's title in so far as the Company were concerned, for the Company did not "derive right" from the trustees, but from the eleventh Duke under the excambion of 1854. Further, the agreement of 1889 was between the Company and the twelfth Duke. Under neither deed did the Company derive right from the trustees. If it had been intended to include rights acquired under these earlier deeds it would have been easy to say so. "Right" did not mean mere licence to work. It meant a proper right to minerals by disposition or lease.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The provisions of the feu-disposition to the pursuer in 1898, by which he obtained no right to minerals, include a clause to the effect that if damage is caused to the surface or to buildings on the subject by mineral workings, whether these be old workings or future workings, there should be no claim competent to the pursuer or those coming into his right against the granters or their successors, "or their tacksmen or other persons deriving right from them."

Carron Company obtained by excambion a certain seam of minerals in the lands of which the feu of the pursuer forms a part. The excambion took place between them and the eleventh Duke of Hamilton. Subsequent to this there was a minute of agreement between the Company and the twelfth Duke, which however was not put upon the record. By that agreement each party got the right of working their minerals so as to take out the whole mineral, any question of damages being met by an agreed-upon royalty on the output. Carron Company under this agreement have claimed relief against any claim the pursuer may have, and the trustees of the twelfth Duke have been sisted to defend the action.

Taking the clause above quoted by itself, and construing it according to ordinary rules of interpretation, it appears distinctly enough to be a surrendering of any claim on the part of the pursuer to damages resulting from the working of the minerals, the working of which could do injury to his feu, or the erections he might put upon it, and that whether such working was done by his authors or by others who might derive right from them, in whatever form the right to work the minerals might be given.

That being so, the true question in the case is, whether Carron Company in excavating the coal were doing so under a right from the trustees of the Duke. The position was this, that the agreement by which power was obtained to work out the entire minerals was dated in 1889. It may be that, as is averred, the pursuer did not know of the agreement. But this does not, as it appears to me, affect the question under consideration. For he had surrendered any claim he might have had to the effect of shutting him out from recovering damages against the granters or their successors, or their tacksmen or others deriving right from them, apart from all question when or why those having the right should bring down the surface, provided always it was done in the legitimate working of the coal according to recognised practice.

I do not go into the matter in detail, as I have had an opportunity of perusing the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling, in which I concur. I would move that the interlocutor under review be recalled, that the third plea in law for the defenders be sustained, and that they be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case I am not able to agree with the judgment of the Sheriff. I am not sure that I quite understand his particular view. But in any case that view was not, as I think, ultimately maintained to us.

The questions really involved are, I think, two—(1) Whether the pursuer, who acquired in 1898 from the compearing defenders, the testamentary trustees of the twelfth Duke of Hamilton, a feu of a certain piece of ground exclusive of minerals, is excluded from claiming support to his surface by the previous recorded titles of the subjacent minerals; (2) whether, if not, the pursuer has, by the terms of his own title—that is to say, his feu-disposition of 1898—renounced as against his superiors the compearing defenders, and by consequence as against the other defenders (Carron Company), who are working the subjacent minerals under the authority of the compearing defenders, whatever right of support he might have otherwise had.

The first question turns upon the terms of a certain clause in the conveyance of minerals made in the year 1854 in favour of the defenders Carron Company by the eleventh Duke of Hamilton, who then owned both surface and minerals in and around the pursuer's feu. That conveyance is contained in the contract of excambion printed in the appendix, and by it there is conveyed to Carron Company, inter alia, certain coal under what is now the pursuer's feu, "with all right, title, and interest, present and future, of the said Duke of Hamilton and Brandon in the said coals hereby disponed by him, and all right competent to the said Duke with reference to the working of the said coals." On this conveyance infeftment followed, and it is not disputed that if upon the just construction of the clause just quoted there was a surrender in favour of Carron Company of the Duke's right of support, that surrender is conclusive against the present action, which is an action of damages against Carron Company in respect of injury to the surface by their underground workings. The pursuer, however, construes the clause differently, and contends that, as the decisions on this subject stand, the Duke, although assigning to Carron Company "all rights competent to him with reference to the working of the minerals," must be held to have done so only to the effect of transferring to the Company such rights as he would have had as owner of the minerals if the two estates of surface and minerals had been already separated.

It appears to me to be, apart from authority, somewhat difficult to limit in the way suggested, and to make practically superfluous the clause referred to, and upon the cases cited I am not satisfied that the difficulty is removed. I do not, however, propose to decide the question thus raised, or to express any decided opinion about it. For it appears to me that assuming the point in favour of the pursuer, the present case may be decided, and I think without much difficulty, upon the second point—the point, namely, as to the effect of the pursuer's own title of 1898.

By that title—I mean the feu-disposition obtained in 1898 by the pursuer from the compearing defenders—the subjacent minerals were as usual excepted from the conveyance, and it was further provided that the pursuer should have no claim in respect of injury to the surface by the working of the subjacent minerals "against the said trustees (the compearing defenders) or their foresaids, or their tacksmen, or other persons deriving right from them."

The question is whether the defenders, Carron Company—who it is admitted have by their longwall workings caused the injury complained of, and have done so by virtue of the agreement made in 1889 between them and the compearing defenders' author the twelfth Duke of Hamilton—have the benefit of the above stipulation in the pursuer's title as being, in the sense of that stipulation, persons working in the compearing defenders' right.

There could, I think, have been no doubt on that subject if the 1889 agreement had been made by the compearing defenders themselves instead of being made by their author, the last Duke. In other words, I am unable to doubt that if in 1889 the compearing defenders, being still owners of the surface, had (by way of supplement to, or explanation of, the conveyance of minerals made in the contract of excambion in 1854) granted to Carron Company the right so to work as to bring down the surface, the said Company, thus working in the compearing defenders' right, would have had, as against the pursuer, all the benefits of the clause of immunity contained in the pursuer's title. I say so, because I think it is clear that the clause in question does not require that the right to work, which is to carry with it the immunity, should be necessarily a right conferred in the future, or be a right conferred by a recorded title, or be a right attached to a disposition or tack of minerals, or, in short, be a right conceived in any particular form or granted in any particular way. All that is, as it seems to me, required is that Carron Company, or other persons claiming to work with the benefit of the immunity, shall be in fact persons working with the authority of the compearing defenders.

But that being so, does it make any difference that the deed of 1889 was granted not by the compearing defenders—the testamentary trustees of the twelfth Duke—but by the twelfth Duke himself? I am unable to think so. The trustees represent their author. In all questions with third parties they are identified with him. They are bound by his acts and deeds, and the authority which was originally given by him, is now, as a continuing authority, in a quite proper sense an authority derived from them. The case in fact is, so far as I can see, just the same as if the twelfth Duke, having granted the deed of 1889, had lived to grant the pursuer's feu in 1898 and had also lived to compear, as his trustees have done, in the present action. It seems to me hardly disputable that if he had done so the pursuer's case must have been at an end.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment should be recalled, and that decree of absolvitor should be pronounced in favour of Carron Company.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The pursuer Pringle is feuar of a house in the parish of Grangemouth, to which his title is a feu-disposition by the trustees of the late Duke of Hamilton, dated 6th December 1898 and registered 18th January 1899. The minerals under the feu are expressly excepted from the disposition, and I understand that the pursuer makes no claim to them. But he has raised this action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk for injury to his house and to the surface by the workings of the defenders Carron Company. Carron Company admit having worked the minerals under the pursuer's house, and having injured the house in doing so, but they claim that under their titles from the Duke of Hamilton they had right to work the minerals without paying for damage for the subsidence of the surface.

The title of Carron Company is an excambion between the Company and the Duke of Hamilton, dated 18th and 23d December 1854, on which apparently no infeftment passed. The minerals thereby disponed to Carron Company consist of the main coal and the Coxrod coal beneath, inter alia, what is now the pursuer's house.

An agreement between Carron Company and the succeeding Duke of Hamilton, author of the trustees, who granted the pursuer's feu-contract, is of more consequence. That is a somewhat complicated deed, dated in November 1889, and apparently, so far as it bears on the questions raised, it comes to this, that it confers power on Carron Company to work the minerals in question by longwall although the surface should be thereby let down, and provides that the Duke should relieve the Company of all claims for damage to the surface by such working. This was a personal contract on which there was and could be no infeftment. The late Duke of Hamilton died at a date not mentioned in the pleadings, and his trustees are the granters of the disposition in favour of the pursuer Pringle. The position at the date of the Duke's death was this, that it was agreed that Carron Company should incur no liability to the owner of the surface, that is, to the Duke, on account of damage to the surface by their workings.

The feu-disposition to the pursuer was granted in 1898. It expressly excepts all the minerals from the grant, and reserves them to the granters.

This feu-disposition to the pursuer contains an elaborate and somewhat difficult clause on which the case appears to a large extent to depend, and which requires somewhat careful attention. That clause, besides excepting the minerals from the disposition and reserving them to the granters and their successors, with power to work them, provides that in the event of injury being caused to the ground disponed or to the buildings erected or to be erected thereon, "or in any other manner of way, by and through the past or future workings of the said ironstone, coal, fireclay, marble, shale, and limestone, or other metals, minerals, or stone, under or near the ground hereby disponed, no claim for damage or recompense shall on such account lie or be competent to my said disponee (i.e., the pursuer) or his foresaids, against the said trustees or their foresaids, or their tacksmen, or other persons deriving right from them."

This clause does not provide that the pursuer shall have no claim for damages on account of surface injury, but only that he shall have no such claim against (1) the trustees, or (2) their foresaids (that is, the successors of the trustees), or (3) their tacksmen, or (4) other persons deriving right from them. In a question with anyone else than those enumerated the pursuer's right to protection of the surface remains, and therefore it would remain in this question with Carron Company unless Carron Company is included in this final clause. The clause protects the Duke's trustees and other persons deriving right from them not expressly including Carron Company, and the questions seem to be these two—(1) does the protection of the trustees from claims for damages involve the protection of Carron Company because the liability of Carron Company would involve a claim of relief against the trustees; and (2) can Carron Company be held to be covered by the words "other persons deriving right from them," that is, from the trustees? I am of opinion that these questions should be answered in the affirmative. It appears unreasonable to hold that the Duke of Hamilton should give up all claim for surface damages against Carron Company, and that the Duke's trustees should straightway (in manifest derogation of that deed) put a feuar in the position of claiming such damages. That could hardly have been intended, and it seems to me that the words "other persons deriving right from them," i.e., from the Duke's trustees, may be read as including persons (such as Carron Company) deriving right not immediately from the Duke's trustees but from the Duke, whose trustees they are. I am therefore of opinion that the claim of the pursuer for such damages fails, and that the appeal should be sustained and the defenders assoilzied.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—When the pursuer obtained his feu-disposition of the surface from the trustees of the twelfth Duke of Hamilton in 1898 he got no right to the subjacent minerals. These were expressly excepted and reserved, and it did not matter, so far as this clause was concerned, whether the minerals were at the time the property of the trustees or had been (as in fact they had been) conveyed to Carron Company by excambion in 1854, for in either case the pursuer got no right to them. Further, it was provided by the feu-disposition of 1898 that in the event of loss or damage being caused to the surface or buildings thereon through the past or future working of the minerals under or near the ground thereby disponed, no claim for damage or recompense should on such account lie or be competent to the pursuer or his heirs and assignees against the trustees or their successors, or their tacksmen, or other persons deriving right from them. It is on this clause that I think the present question turns.

Pringle v. Carron Co.

The mineral workings which have resulted in damage to the pursuer's buildings have been carried on by Carron Company in virtue of the excambion of 1854, which was a recorded contract between them and the eleventh Duke of Hamilton supplemented by an unrecorded minute of agreement between Carron Company and the twelfth Duke, whereby it was arranged that mutual claims of damages should be settled by each party obtaining the privilege of working their respective minerals by the longwall system or other process of complete excavation on payment to the other party of certain royalties. Under this agreement Carron Company have claimed to be relieved by the trustees of the twelfth Duke of any sums to which the pursuer may be found entitled in this action, and the trustees, admitting their obligation of relief, have been sisted as compearing defenders.

The pursuer's case is that he has not surrendered his claim of damages for subsidence except as against the trustees or other persons deriving right from them, and that Carron Company derived their right to take the coal the excavation of which has caused the subsidence from the eleventh Duke under the excambion, or if the agreement of 1889 was necessary to complete their right, it was a transaction between them and the twelfth Duke of which he had no notice, and which was not referred to in his feu-disposition. All that he had the means of knowing, he says, when he acquired his feu, was that his disponers had parted with the subjacent minerals, and therefore he might readily and safely agree to give up any claim of damages for mineral workings against them or those in their right.

I suppose it may be admitted that this question, which is not without difficulty, might have been obviated by a little more precision of language in the feu-disposition. But I am of opinion that the clause in that deed, as it stands, is sufficient to exclude the pursuer's claim. It seems to me that we are not concerned with the considerations which may have led the pursuer to consent to the insertion of this clause in his feu-right. The fact remains that it was inserted and has to be construed. The pursuer thereby agreed to give up any claim of damages for mineral workings, past or future, against the trustees or anybody deriving right from them. The right did not require to be constituted by sale; it might be by lease or by licence in writing. Now, have Carron Company derived right from the trustees? I think they have, in a substantial sense, because at the date of the feu-disposition, assuming the trustees could have prevented complete excavation by Carron Company, they were prevented from asserting that right by the fact that their author, the twelfth Duke, had made the agreement of 1889. The fact (which must be assumed in the pursuer's favour), that he did not know of that agreement, is not material, because the surrender of his claim of damages was not made conditional on the trustees themselves acquiring the right to bring down his surface or conferring the right upon others at any particular time or in any particular way or for any particular reason. There might have been a subsequent purchase of the minerals by the trustees, or a subsequent tack or licence to or by them, and still the pursuer would have had no redress. Does it matter that the right or permission given by the trustees to Carron Company, instead of being a voluntary act, is given because their author, the twelfth Duke, came under an obligation by which they are bound? In short, I think that the pursuer's claim fails if Carron Company can be said to be deriving right from the trustees in any substantial sense, and that in construing a contract (which is what we are doing here) it is too literal and technical to say that Carron Company derive their right not from the trustees but from their author. The unreality of the plea appears plainly enough when it is remembered that the claim if successful would have to be borne by the trustees and not by Carron Company.

I am therefore for recalling the interlocutors appealed against, sustaining the third plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzieing them, with expenses.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutors appealed against: Sustain the third plea in law for the defenders Carron Company; assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find" as to expenses.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF RUTHERGLEN, Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Salvesen—D. P. Fleming.
MAGISTRATES OF RUTHERGLEN, Respondents.—Campbell, K.C.—Morton.

Burgh—Street—Improving Line of Street—Ultra Vires—Resolution of Commissioners allowing Buildings to be set forward so as to close up existing Public Street—Competency—Effect of General Improvement Scheme—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 157.—The 157th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, enacts, with regard to the powers of Burgh Commissioners, that "the Commissioners may allow, upon such terms as they think fit, any building within the burgh to be set forward for improving the line of the street in which such building or any building adjacent thereto is situated." Held that it was competent for Burgh Commissioners to allow a building to be set forward with the effect of closing one end of a public lane, the alteration being part of an improvement scheme which provided another entrance for the lane.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE TOWN COUNCIL OF RUTHERGLEN, on 11th July 1904, passed a resolution,* fixing an improved line for Main Street (shewn in the plan on page 831 as a dotted line), and allowing certain buildings, the property of the corporation, to be set forward to that line. The Parish Council of Rutherglen, who were the proprietors of the buildings adjoining those to be set forward, appealed against this resolution to the Sheriff-

* The resolution was in these terms:—"That for improving the line of Main Street, the building line of the buildings situated on the north side thereof, between King Street Lane and the property belonging to the Rutherglen Educational Trust, be a line commencing at a point in Main Street, being the westmost point of the existing building line of the property belonging to the said trust, and thence continuing in a straight line westwards to a point 18 feet or thereby northwards from the existing building line in Main Street of the property belonging to the corporation, and presently occupied as a public-house by Robert Anderson, all as the said new building line is delineated and coloured red and blue on the plan after referred to, and that the buildings situated as aforesaid be allowed to be set forward or set backward, as the case may be, to the said new building line shewn on said plan, all in terms of sections 157 and 158 of The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892." Section 157 is quoted in the rubric.

substitute (Scott Moncrieff), who dismissed the appeal, and confirmed the resolution. On the Parish Council appealing to the Sheriff (Guthrie) he adhered, with certain slight variations, to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. The Parish Council then appealed by way of stated case to the Court of Session, and a case was stated by the Sheriff.

The following facts were set forth as proved or admitted:—"(2) That the intention of the respondents is to bring forward the building line southwards, and themselves to erect, immediately to the west of and adjoining the appellants' premises, a block of buildings, which will extend about 15 feet to the south of the line of the Parish Council Offices at their western gable. (3) That the position of the buildings and the lines of streets are shewn upon the plans Nos. 4/2* and 21 of process, which I have signed as part of this case: and that while King Street Lane is a public street, a part of the portion of it running east and west has, by the demolition of the old jail or town-house, become practically part of Main Street. (4) That if the building line is brought forward southwards as proposed, the solum of King Street Lane, as shewn on the said plans, so far as it runs east to west, will be built over, but that the respondents intend, by removing certain adjacent property, to open up a new entrance to the said lane from Main Street, which will have the effect of rendering that lane straight."

The question of law was,—"Whether it was competent, under The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 157, for the Town Council to pass the resolution referred to?"

Argued for the appellants;—Section 157 gave powers of altering property without compensation, and must be strictly interpreted. The resolution here appealed against was incompetent, because (1) it involved building over and obliterating a public street. Such a result was clearly outwith the provisions of section 157, which only contemplated setting forward a building to bring it into conformity with the adjacent buildings and so improve the line of the street. The suggestion that it was proposed to open another entrance to King Street Lane was irrelevant. It could not make a resolution that went beyond the powers of the statute competent, and, further, it was not embodied in the resolution, and there was no guarantee that it would be carried out. (2) It was not an improvement such as was contemplated by the Act. What was proposed here was not to improve the line of a street but to substitute one street for another. The buildings affected by the new line were buildings fronting King Street Lane. It was not proposed to improve King Street Lane, but to destroy this portion of it altogether, by building over part of it and throwing another part into Main Street. Power for such an extensive alteration could only be obtained by means of a Provisional Order. (3) The Commissioners had acted ultra vires in laying down a new line for a street. All that the statute permitted was improving a street by bringing buildings into conformity with an existing line. Though eventually by this resolution the line might be improved, the immediate result would be to make it more irregular, and the immediate result in view of the presently existing line of buildings was all that could be considered.[1] (4) This alteration involved material damage to the appellants' property, and so, whether an improvement or not, was not competent.[1] The street would be removed at one place 15 feet from their building; the projection of the new building would deprive them of light and air; and their convenient access to King Street Lane would be cut off. The purpose of the respondents here was obviously to obtain an increased area on which to erect a large new public building, and to do so without paying compensation, by making use of section 157, which did not provide for compensation, and which was never intended to be used for such a purpose. For such a purpose they should have obtained a Provisional Order, under which the appellants would have got full compensation.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The setting forward of buildings so as to encroach upon the solum of a public street had been decided to be competent.[1] In considering the building over of King Street Lane the improvement scheme must be regarded as a whole,[1] and, as the Sheriff had stated, it was intended to open a new and better entrance to King Street Lane by removing other buildings.[2] The appellants' interests in seeing that this was done were entirely safeguarded by the Dean of Guild Court, whose sanction would have to be obtained before the alterations provided for in the resolution could be carried into effect. (2) There was nothing in the statute to indicate that the opening of a new entrance to an existing lane and the throwing of a portion of the lane into a wide public street, where such alterations improved the lines of the lane and the street, were to be excluded from the improvements contemplated by sec. 157. (3) The laying down of an improved line for Main Street did not render the resolution incompetent. All the resolution really did was to permit certain buildings to be set forward, in terms of sec. 157. The reference to the improved line was merely an indication to the appellants that, if they so desired, they too would be permitted to set forward their buildings to that line. (4) This appeal was only on a question of law. All questions of improvement and amenity were already decided by the Sheriff, whose decision on these points was final.[3]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question which we have to answer in this case is whether it was competent under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 157, for the respondents to pass the resolution set forth in the stated case.

That resolution is in the following terms:—(His Lordship read the resolution).

By section 339 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, an appeal is allowed to any person whose property may be affected, or who thinks himself aggrieved by any resolution of the Commissioners made or done under any of the provisions of the Act, either to the Sheriff or Court of Session, who should make such order thereon either confirming, quashing, varying, or reducing the order, resolution, or act appealed against as the Sheriff or Court should think fit, and it is provided that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute should be subject to review by the Sheriff, and, subject to this appeal, should be final. This section, however, of the Act was amended by the 104th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, which provided that any party dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff, as erroneous in point of law, might appeal thereagainst to the Court of Session in terms and subject to the provisions of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875.

The appellants in this case appealed first to the Sheriff-substitute, who refused the appeal, and confirmed the resolution of the respondents. They then appealed to the Sheriff, who adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute with a variation, and they have now appealed to us on the question of law stated in the case. We have not therefore to consider whether the resolution is well founded on its merits—whether, for example, it would constitute a public improvement or would unduly interfere with the amenity or value of the appellant's property or otherwise—all such questions having been finally disposed of by the Sheriff. The only question we have to consider is whether the resolution in question was competent under the 157th section of the Burgh Police Act of 1892.

That section is in these terms:—"The Commissioners may allow, on such terms as they think fit, any building within the burgh to be set forward for improving the line of the street in which such building or any building adjacent thereto is situated."

It is clear, from the phraseology of the section, that it is intended to apply to what no doubt is the common case of a third party, the proprietor of a building, applying to the Commissioners for leave to put forward his building to a particular line, and that, if there is nothing in the circumstances to make it incompetent, they have power to do so. But if they have power to do so in the case of a third party, I do not see how it can be disputed that they have power to allow themselves, as proprietors of buildings, to put forward buildings to a particular line. I think accordingly that the case is to be treated exactly as if it had been the case of a third party to whom leave had been granted to put forward his buildings, and that the question is whether there are, as the appellants maintain, such circumstances in the case as to render it incompetent for the respondents to have granted such leave.

Now, clearly to understand the resolution, and what is proposed to be effected thereby, it is necessary to look at the plan therein referred to.

It appears accordingly that the appellants are the owners of property, having buildings thereon fronting Main Street on the north side of the street, and that the respondents are the owners of the property adjoining these buildings on the west. The respondents' property is bounded on the west by King Street Lane, which runs from north to south till it meets certain property in Main Street, also the property of the respondents, when it turns eastwards and runs along between the respondents' buildings on the north and south, for between 20 and 40 feet, when it passes into Main Street. It thus appears that the buildings which the respondents propose to set forward are at present bounded on the west by King Street Lane, and on the south, for about one-third of their length, also by King Street

No. 147.

Parish Council of Rutherglen v. Magistrates of Rutherglen.

Lane, and for the remaining distance by Main Street. There is also shewn on the plan, a line coloured red and blue, which shews the line to which the respondents propose to put forward their buildings. Now, it is sufficiently clear that if the respondents' buildings were put forward to the new line of the street as proposed, the effect would be that King Street Lane, so far as it runs east and west, would be entirely built over, and King Street Lane, we are told by the Sheriff, is a public street.

It is the fact that the resolution thus allows a public street to be entirely built over, which constitutes the main if not the only objection to its competency. Now, if we were tied down to consider only what appears on the face of the resolution, I think that would be a formidable objection to its competency. But I agree with the Sheriff that we are entitled to consider the whole scheme of improvement of the respondents, of which the putting forward of the buildings mentioned in the resolution only forms a part. But we are told by the Sheriff that it is the intention of the respondents to remove the property belonging to them in Main Street occupied by Robert Anderson, which now forms the southern side of King Street Lane, where it runs east and west, and to open up a new entrance to the said lane by Main Street. If that building were removed, the effect would be that King Street Lane, so far as it runs east and west, would practically cease to exist as a separate lane and become merged in Main Street, and that the whole buildings on the respondents' property would then front Main Street.

That is a state of matters which the respondents have it in their power to produce at any time by simply removing the building in question. Had they done so before passing the resolution I should have thought it quite unobjectionable.

In these circumstances, I am not disposed to find that the resolution in question is incompetent. I think we should pronounce an interlocutor to the effect that, as it is stated by the respondents that it is part of their scheme for the improvement of the line of Main Street that the house in Main Street, presently occupied by Robert Anderson, should be removed, on that footing and condition answer the question in the case in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. We have nothing to do with any question of expediency or amenity which may have been considered by the Sheriff, but are required to consider only the question of law stated in the case, whether the resolution in question is competent. Now, it is to be observed that the resolution in question is not an operative order of any kind, but is simply an allowance or sanction of certain things being done which may form the foundation of an application to the Dean of Guild Court. What the resolution allows to be done is that, for improving the line of Main Street, the buildings situated on the north may be set forward, and the other buildings described in the resolution set backward, such buildings being set forward or set backward, as the case may be, so as to conform to the new proposed line of the street. Now, the objection to the competency, at least the only formidable objection to the competency, of that resolution was that under colour of improving the building line of Main Street the Corporation proposed to cover over with buildings and so shut up another public street in Rutherglen called King Street Lane; and if they proposed to do nothing else but set forward these buildings to the north so as to encroach upon what is now King Street Lane, there is no doubt that the effect would be to shut up that lane, because when the buildings to the north are set forward they are met by the existing buildings to the south. But then it is perfectly clear, as I take it, upon the construction of the resolution with reference to the plan that that is not the scheme of the Corporation at all. Their scheme is that when they put forward their buildings to the north they should take down and remove the existing buildings to the south, so as to furnish a sufficient line of street fronting the new line of buildings. I think all parties interested are sufficiently safeguarded against any departure from that scheme of building, because, as I have said, the resolution will only enable an application to be presented to the Dean of Guild Court, in which all just and necessary conditions of building may be imposed. That objection, therefore, seems to me to fall to the ground. But then it was said that, even although the roadway is left as a sufficient access, the street called King Street Lane will still be obliterated, because the new line of roadway will not be King Street Lane but Main Street. I think that is a mere question of words and names that has no practical force or significance at all. I think that while we are confined for the determining facts to the statement of the case, we may legitimately look at the Sheriff's judgment for the ground of his decision in law, and I agree with the way in which he has dealt with this particular point, because he says:—"The critical contention that the statute does not authorise the setting forward of a building over the whole of a street, which was once, and may still perhaps be strictly called, King Street Lane, is, in my opinion, too technical. We must look at things as they are, and, doing so, we find that the real question relates to the improvement of the line of Main Street at the point where the properties of the parties meet." That being the real question, and the objection to the encroachment upon one part of the street being met by the condition that the buildings to the south are to be removed, I see no objection to the competency of the resolution. I may add that I quite agree in Lord Adam's view that it is well to make it quite clear what the condition upon which the Court answers the question in the affirmative really is by inserting in the interlocutor the words which he proposes.

It was stated that LORD M'LAREN, who was present at the hearing, but absent at advising, concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent at the hearing, and did not deliver an opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that as it is stated by the respondents that it is part of their scheme for the improvement of the line of Main Street, Rutherglen, that the house in Main Street presently occupied by Robert Anderson be removed, on that footing and condition answer the question in the case in the affirmative, and decern," &c.

DERWENT ROLLING MILLS COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Wilson, K.C.—Moncrieff.

Jurisdiction—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Amendments made in the course of the action.—Arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa found jurisdiction not only in the action as originally laid, but as competently amended.

Process—Amendment—Competency—Summons laid on Bill of Exchange—Alternative conclusion and averment of circumstances in which bill was granted added by amendment.—Held that it was competent to amend a summons concluding for payment of the sum due under a bill of exchange by inserting an alternative conclusion for payment of the sum for which the bill was granted, and adding to the condescendence a statement of the circumstances in which the bill was granted.

Loan—Proof—Writ sufficient to prove Loan.—Held that, the passing of money from A to B having been proved by means of a cheque, post entries in pencil in B's ledger and an entry by B in a statement of account between himself and A were sufficient to establish that the money passed from A to B under a contract of loan.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

MRS HENRIETTA ALICE ASHBY OR HOPE, with consent and concurrence of her husband, Mr John Alfred Hope, brought an action against the Derwent Rolling Mills Company, Limited, Workington, against whom arrestments had been used ad fundandam jurisdictionem. The action concluded for payment to the pursuer of "the sum of £500 sterling, being the amount contained in a bill of exchange, dated 19th February 1902, drawn by the female pursuer upon and accepted by the defenders, and payable on demand with interest . . . Or otherwise the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £500 sterling, with interest. . . ."* The record was closed on 13th January 1903.

On 5th June 1903 the Lord Ordinary ordered intimation of the action to be made to Mr William B. Peat, who had been appointed by the English Courts receiver on the defendant company's estates, in order that he might sist himself as a defender, if so advised. On 4th July 1903 Peat was sisted as a defender.

In her condescendence the pursuer founded on the bill specified in the summons. She admitted that the acceptance was written by the secretary of the Company, and averred that the bill was still due and resting owing.

In answer it was explained that the acceptance of the bill in name of the defendant Company was written by the secretary of the Company, and was not authorised by the board of directors; that the said acceptance in name of the Company was, by the articles of association of the Company, ultra vires of the secretary; and that the defenders were not thereby bound.

With regard to the circumstances in which the bill was granted the pursuer averred that in the beginning of February 1902 the defendant Company contracted to purchase from Le Bas & Company, London, a cargo of steel bars, and being short of funds, and unable to uplift the bills of lading for the said cargo, requested an advance from Mrs Hope for this purpose, and that Mrs Hope on 5th February agreed to advance the sum necessary to enable the Company to uplift the bills of lading. The pursuer further averred:—"Mrs Hope on the same day granted a cheque in favour of the Company for £2000 for this purpose. On 15th February the bills of lading were uplifted. The amount required for this purpose was £2196, 17s. 3d." Of this sum £196, 17s. 3d. was advanced by the Company's bankers. "It was a condition of said transaction that the warrants representing the said cargo should be held subject to Mrs Hope's orders, and released by her from time to time to such extent as should be required by the Company, and that the Company should pay to Mrs Hope the value of each lot of bars so released. When Mrs Hope was asked to release a second lot of bars, the bill sued on was handed to her by the Company on account of the value of said lot, and the first lot released by her." * It was further stated that Mrs Hope had received certain sums in repayment of this loan, but the balance, with interest, remained due.

The defenders admitted that on 15th February Mrs Hope agreed to purchase and take over the bars on her own account. They stated,—"On said date the bills of lading were uplifted by her, and she paid the price, viz., £2196, 17s. 3d., by cheque in favour of Le Bas & Company." † They explained that the payments made by the Company to Mrs Hope were made on account of the price of bars received by the Company from Mrs Hope.

The defenders further averred that the letters of arrestment to found jurisdiction had been executed only with reference to the sum alleged to be contained in and due under the bill of exchange, being the debt originally sued on. "The said letters are not competent to found jurisdiction with reference to the alleged loan of £500 said to be due apart from the bill, or set forth in the amendment added to the summons after the execution of the said letters of arrestment."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The sum sued for being due and resting owing to the female pursuer under the bill of exchange libelled, decree should be pronounced as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The pursuer having advanced to the defenders the sums above set forth, *or, in any event, having disbursed the same on behalf of the Company and at their request, and the defenders being due and resting owing to her in respect *thereof a sum exceeding the sums sued for, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for. (5) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction quoad the alleged debt referred to in the alternative conclusion of the summons, added by way of amendment after execution of the letters of arrestment to found jurisdiction. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (6) The averments of loan can only be proved by writ or oath of the defenders.

A proof was led. The material facts disclosed at the proof are sufficiently set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President.

The pursuer founded on the following documents:—(1) The bill.

† At the bar it was admitted that the amount of this cheque was £2000.

(2) An entry—"Feb. 15, 1902. By cash received for bars, £2196, 17s. 3d."—contained in a statement of the account in the books of the defenders between the pursuer, Mrs Hope, and the defenders. An excerpt from this account was lodged in process (No. 82 of process), and by joint minute of the parties it was admitted that, inter alia, No. 82 of process was a true copy of the original document. (3) The following entries in pencil in the defenders' cash-book:—On the Dr. side—"Feb. 15. Mrs Hope, £2196, 17s. 3d."; on the Cr. side—"Feb. 15. To Le Bas & Co., £2196, 17s. 3d."

On 16th December 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) granted decree against the defenders, the Derwent Rolling Mills Company, Limited, for the sum of £500, with interest thereon, as concluded for.*

* "OPINION.— . . . What I have to decide is whether or not on the whole matter the defenders have any good defence to the pursuer's claim. I am of opinion in the negative, and I am disposed to think that when the case is understood no other result is possible.

"The facts—the relevant facts—are very simple, and are, I think, shortly these: The defenders' Company had in the beginning of 1902 bought for the purposes of their works a cargo of iron bars to be paid for on ship's arrival, and exchange in due course of dock warrants for bill of lading. When the iron arrived, the Company were unable to pay the price, which turned out to be £2196. The iron was required, and if not got the Company's rolling mills must have been stopped. In these circumstances the pursuer, who is the wife of the managing director and principal shareholder of the Company, was applied to for an advance out of her separate estate of £2000 to enable the Company to take up the warrants. She ultimately agreed, on being secured to the satisfaction of her solicitors, who were, as it happened, also the solicitors of the Company's bankers. The result was an arrangement whereby by means of the £2000 which she provided, and £196 provided by the bank, the pursuer took up the warrants, doing so in her own name, but on the footing that she should release or deliver them to the Company in lots as required, upon payment for each lot of a proportion of the disbursed price. She agreed also, in consideration of the Company's bankers advancing the said £196, that they should hold the warrants to her order and on her behalf, but primarily in security to themselves (1) of the £196, and (2) of a previous advance of about £350 made by them to the Company on the pursuer's guarantee. In the outcome of the transaction the pursuer received only about £670 to account of her £2000. For the rest, unfortunately for herself, she released the warrants, or allowed their delivery to the Company, upon receipt only of the Company's cheques, and not of cash. Of these cheques, she has not yet got, and I am afraid is not likely to get, payment. She got, however, upon the release of the first two lots of warrants (about 100 tons) a bill for £500 payable on demand and signed by the Company's secretary. For the amount of this bill she some time ago brought the present action, the bill being produced and founded upon. But the facts being as I have said, the summons was at an early stage amended, I think sufficiently, to cover any claim within the amount sued for which upon the actual facts arose to the pursuer against the Company.

"Such being the position—the facts being what I have said, and being really not in dispute—it should, one would have thought, have been difficult to find materials for litigation. The pursuer being undoubtedly creditor of the Company for an amount largely exceeding the sum sued for, it would not have occurred to one as useful to inquire critically to what precise legal category the transaction should be referred. For the pursuer sued simply as an ordinary creditor of the Company; and doing so, it could make no difference as to her right to decree that she had founded jurisdiction by arrestments, and had also used arrestments upon the dependence.

June 27, 1905. Hope v. Derwent Rolling Mills Co., Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The original action was laid solely on the bill of exchange, and that bill, having been accepted in name of the Company by the secretary, was not binding on the Company. The letters of arrestment to found jurisdiction, having been executed only with reference to the sum due under the bill, were incompetent to found jurisdiction in respect to the loan of £500 alleged to be due apart from the bill, repayment of which was sued for in the alternative conclusion of the summons. Arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa founded jurisdiction only in the action as originally laid, and did not warrant decree in terms of a conclusion which was added to the summons after the letters of arrestment had been executed. The addition of the new conclusion fundamentally altered the ground of action. Jurisdiction founded by arrestment itself rested on a fiction, and was strictly limited in its effects.[1] Being contrary to the principle actor sequitur forum rei, it should not be

The defenders' Company, however, having got into difficulties, defences were lodged, and a receiver having been subsequently appointed, that official was sisted as a defender, and has thought it necessary to litigate—doing so, it appears, in the view that, as acting for creditors, it was his duty—as perhaps it was—to state all pleas, however technical, which might suffice to throw out the action, and so to destroy the arrestments. And the pleas which he has in this view maintained are, in substance, I think, these—(1) That the action, so far as rested on the bill, is bad, because the bill is not signed by two directors in terms of the articles of the Company; (2) that, so far as the action is founded on loan, the loan is not proved scripto as required by the law of Scotland; and (3) that the true legal category under which the pursuer's claim comes is not loan, but either mandate or sale and delivery, neither of which grounds of action are, it is said, properly pleaded upon record.

"Now, I am bound to say that for myself I see no substantial objection to the pursuer's action, even as laid on the bill. It may be true that the bill was not signed, as required by the articles of the Company, by the secretary and two directors. But it is, I think, sufficiently proved that it was got by the pursuer in exchange for warrants of about equivalent value which she released to the Company at the time; and it seems to me that, if the Company desires to repudiate that transaction as ultra vires of their official, they can only do so by returning to the pursuer her warrants, which is not proposed, and is indeed now impossible.

"Apart, therefore, altogether from the amendment made on the summons when the action came into Court and the additions to the condescendence thereafter made on adjustment (an amendment and additions entirely regular), I am not, as at present advised, prepared to say anything against the propriety of the action, even as originally laid. And I am the less prepared to do so, because our rule of process (which in an action like this I suppose still requires the mention in the summons of any liquid document of debt on which the pursuer may propose to found) does not, as I understand it, preclude the pursuer from resting her case ultimately, not upon the document of debt itself, but upon the contract, whatever it is, which lies behind the document.

"Again, I see no particular difficulty—taking the record as it now stands—in maintaining the action, if that is desired, as an action laid upon loan. There may be a question whether in strictness the real contract between the carried further than was expressly warranted by authority and precedent.[1] The nexus laid on the foreigner's moveables was loosed as soon as he gave caution judicio sisti.[2] The forms of arrestment to found jurisdiction shewed the limited nature of the jurisdiction so founded.[3] Such arrestment did not subject a foreigner to the jurisdiction of the Court in any action other than the particular action with reference to which it was used, and did not extend to a new action subsequently raised by the same pursuer in reference to the same matter.[4] The amendments allowed by the Lord Ordinary were incompetent, in respect that they introduced a new ground of action and raised a different question between the parties from that raised in the original action.[5] The pencil jottings in the defender's books were not writ of the nature required to instruct loan.[6]

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—The effect of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was to fix the foreigner's moveables so as to make them equivalent to heritage for the purpose of jurisdiction, and accordingly to establish jurisdiction over the foreigner until decree in the action was given.[7] The punctum temporis to be looked to in determining whether a foreigner had been made subject parties was not rather the contract of mandate—the pursuer interposing and taking up the warrants on behalf of the Company and at their request, and being entitled, by way of indemnity for what she disbursed, to a sum considerably exceeding the sum sued for. But the transaction may nevertheless, I think, quite fairly be described as a loan; and as such it is, I cannot doubt, quite sufficiently proved scripto. It is so, inter alia, (1) by the pursuer's cheque, No. 29 of process, which was indorsed by her husband on behalf of the Company, and was, as so indorsed, delivered to her, and transmitted by her to the Company's bankers to be used by them (as it was used) for the Company's purposes; and (2) by entries in the Company's books, which, although made in pencil, and made, as the secretary explains, at posting, are yet perfectly true entries, and constitute by our law the Company's writ.

"Supposing, however, all this to be otherwise—supposing that the contract between the parties was really one of mandate, or supposing even (what I think is absurd) that the pursuer bought the iron on her own account and sold it to the Company from time to time by ordinary sale—supposing either of these things, what does it matter? It involves at most certain amendments on the condescendence and on the pursuer's pleas—amendments which are not only competent, but which it is the duty of the Court to make if it be necessary for determining the real question between the parties. And if the pursuer desires it, I shall have no difficulty in allowing or making any amendment necessary. What the effect of those amendments or of the original amendment of the summons may be on the pursuer's arrestments I am not called on to decide. . . ."

to the jurisdiction of the Court was when appearance was entered in the action, or when the party found caution judicio sisti.[1] The fact that the action was subsequentiy altered or amplified by amendments was of no consequence in the matter of jurisdiction, provided the amendments were competent. Accordingly, the question whether the arrestments were valid to found jurisdiction turned entirely on the question whether the amendments were competent. The amendments were perfectly competent under the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.[2] There was no change in the nature of the action by reason of the amendments, for an action on a bill was merely an action for money due—the bill being the evidence of the debt.[3] In these circumstances the summons might be competently amended, equally with the condescendence, under sec. 29 of the Act of 1868.[4] The cheque proved that the money was paid, and the entries in the books of the defenders, taken with the cheque, were sufficient writ to instruct the loan.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy's, in which he has decerned against the defenders for the sum of £500 sterling, and the peculiarity of the case is that the defenders, who are now really represented by a receiver who has been appointed on the defenders' concern, do not contend that £500 is not due to this pursuer, but maintain that £500 ought not to be decerned for in this action. The reason for that contention is obvious enough. The summons has got, in usual form, a conclusion for arrestment on the dependence of the action, and we are informed that arrestment on the dependence has been executed, and that funds have been arrested, and accordingly if decree is given in the present summons the preference secured by this arrestment will become available to the pursuer; whereas if decree is not given under the present summons, but the debt is constituted under some other summons, or by the acknowledgment of the defenders, the pursuer will only rank pari passu with other creditors in a question with the present defender, who, as I have already said, is the receiver of the Company's property.

Now, that is a very technical defence. I am not for one instant suggesting that it is not a point that may not fairly have been taken by the receiver, who is a Court official, and whose views of his own duty I should be slow to condemn.

But of course a technical defence of that sort must be treated critically, and accordingly I propose to examine critically whether the particular defences proponed by this defender are good or not. The antecedent set of circumstances—for I of set purpose use a popular rather than legal expression—which gave rise to the whole matter, are clear enough. The Hope v. Derwent Rolling Mills Co., Limited.

Derwent Rolling Mills Company was pinched for money. At that time the husband of the pursuer was the managing director of the Company. The Company had entered into a contract for delivery of certain steel bars, and they were in straits to find the wherewithal to pay for them. The manufacturers naturally were not going to part with their property unless they got cash or something equivalent to it, and, in the straits that the Company were in, this managing director bethought him of the pecuniary resources of his wife, who was possessed of a separate estate. Accordingly he made a proposal to his wife, that she should make available a sum of £2000, which she had at that time to invest. Your Lordships will notice that I am using words of an uncoloured description purposely to designate all these transactions. The lady, upon the advice and persuasion of her husband, was willing to make this £2000 available. There were meetings at the offices of the Company, with certain solicitors, and eventually the lady consented to provide this £2000. The way in which she did it was this:—She paid that sum into the bank account which she kept in her own name. At the same time she passed a cheque upon that bank account for the sum of £2000, which she made payable to the defenders' Company. There was a slight complication about £196, which I do not think makes any difference, but which I merely mention in order to shew that I have not overlooked it. The total bill for these steel bars was not £2000 but £2196, and there arose a question as to how, with £2000, they were to meet £2196. The bank interposed there, and said they would be willing to pay the £196 if the proper securities were furnished for their relief.

There is a certain controversy as to what precisely happened upon the £2000 cheque, and the controversy, I think, arises plainly enough because in truth the documents which we have got are, so to speak, contradictory of each other. If you look at the cheque you find that the cheque is what any cheque would be, that is to say, an order of the person in right of the money directed to the bank—the persons who held the money—to pay to a certain person or his order. You thereupon find an indorsation of that cheque by the payee of the cheque, and you find a notandum by the bank that the cheque has been paid. So far, of course, that is the ordinary proceeding you would find on every cheque. But when you go to the lady's bank account you do not find the transaction recorded in the ordinary way in which a transaction, such as I have detailed, would be recorded. In an ordinary statement of a bank account with the lady you would have expected to find an entry on one side or the other (which side depending on the way the account is kept), which would represent the bank taking credit in a question with the lady for having paid out £2000 of her funds to somebody else on the lady's order. You do not find that in this lady's account. The only figure of £2000 which you do find in the lady's account—which in this case was kept as that of the lady in account with the bank—is a credit entry of £2000, being the proceeds of certain bills. You do not find a payment to her order by the cheque mentioned of £2000, but you find it disguised, so to speak, under £2196 paid not to the lady or the lady's order but to Le Bas & Company, the persons who had supplied the steel bars. That £2196 represents in cash the £2000 supplied by the lady, and the £196 which the bank were willing to advance on the lady's security. The effect of the money being paid to Le Bas & Company was that Le Bas & Company consented to deliver the bars. Delivering the bars meant giving up the bills of lading, which were in their turn replaced by dock warrants. The dock warrants practically represented the goods. These dock warrants were held by the lady, she being allowed from time to time to release each particular parcel of bars against the payment of cash to her by the defenders' Company.

Certain payments were made in cash, but after a certain time had gone forward cash became again a little scarce, and accordingly the lady consented to release some parcels of bars, not on getting cash but on getting a bill. She got a bill for £500. Then matters went, so far as the defenders' Company were concerned, from bad to worse. The receiver was appointed, and, the lady not having got the money, this action concluding for £500 was served, and arrestments were used to found jurisdiction in your Lordships' Court.

Now, the provisions of the Court of Session Act make it necessary as a matter of pleading that, where there is a liquid document of debt, it should be stated in the summons, and accordingly the summons, as originally conceived, concluded for £500, and went on to say that that was the sum contained in a bill which was specified by names and date. By this time the receiver was in the saddle, and he put in defences in which he said—the bill is a bad bill because it is not accepted in the way in which under the articles of this particular Company a bill must be accepted in order to make it binding. That averment was true in fact, and accordingly the pursuer, being met by that averment and seeing the materiality of it, made a motion to the Lord Ordinary, under section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, for leave to amend the summons, and she amended the summons by putting in an alternative conclusion for £500, and by adding to the condescendence a statement of the circumstances under which the bill was granted. Now, I do not know that an alternative conclusion need have been put in. I think the same result might have been arrived at—if she really saw that the bill was useless as a bill—by striking out the words "being the amount contained," &c. But the result of putting in the alternative was to leave both the forms of contract, under the bill—the document of debt—and under the antecedent arrangement. The amendment having been made, the defender, the receiver, put in his pleadings an averment that the pursuer's new averment, being tantamount to an averment of loan, could be proved only habili modo, i.e., scripto aut juramento, and in that state of the pleadings the parties went to proof.

The general import of what had already happened I have already stated. The Lord Ordinary held that as a matter of fact the loan had been proved by the proof; but he added at the end of his note a statement that it did not seem to him to matter whether the loan had been proved or not, because there was no doubt that there was an obligation, in one sense or the other, to repay or make good—that is to say, that the lady's money had been enjoyed by the company, and that, even if "loan" was not exactly the correct category under which the obligation would be classed, she would still be entitled to make a correction of the summons, so as to disclose the real character of the transaction. Accordingly an amendment, obviously ob majorem cautelam, was made at the latest stage after the Lord Ordinary had pronounced his opinion, and that amendment now stands on record.

Now, that being the state of the pleadings, the case seems to me to depend on a really very small and very narrow point. We had a very satisfactory argument by Mr Moncrieff, for there is little direct authority as to the origin and effect of arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem. There is no doubt that it is a branch of our law which may be described as artificial in its origin. The original idea of such an arrestment was to arrest property of the defender in the territory to be made good for the purpose of the action, and in olden times there is no doubt an arrestment of that sort did form a nexus on the property, and the nexus was not lost till the action was completed. In course of time all that came to be very much modified. In the first place, caution judicatum solvi ceased, and even the caution judicio sisti disappeared as a nexus on property. It was then held as a fiction that once you had founded jurisdiction by arrestment the jurisdiction was established. For a long time now it is trite practice to say that, though you may have arrested an amount of property by arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, still, when you raise your action in virtue of the jurisdiction thus created, you must arrest again on the dependence if you want to make a real nexus on the property. All that is by this time very familiar law, but the old idea of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa is a very good criterion of what action may be rested on arrestment which has been put on jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. It must be in other words the same action. But when I say it must be "the same action," that means an action with all the potentialities of an action, and therefore as long as arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa is followed by the action therein referred to, it does not seem to me either here or there if that action has been in any way, so to speak, amplified, so long as the amplification is within the forms of process. Therefore, the question whether this arrestment is good for the foundation of jurisdiction seems always to come back to the point of whether these amendments were proper amendments. If they were, it is a proper foundation for jurisdiction, and if they were not, it is a bad foundation.

I come now to whether these were proper amendments. They were made under section 29 of the Court of Session Act. I need scarcely remind your Lordships of the terms of that section, whereby you are bound to make all such amendments as are necessary to determine the real question of controversy, "provided always that it shall not be competent, by amendment of the record or issues, under this Act, to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons." Now, I take that on the question of the bill. Of course there are bills which represent the bill transaction alone. A familiar illustration of that is a banker discounting a bill. He has nothing to do with the transaction represented by the bill, whether it is a gratuitous transaction or not—all he knows is that the bank pays money on the bill. But on the other hand there are many transactions where a bill is not the substance of the matter, but where there is an antecedent contract and a bill is given as an easy way of making good the prestations under that contract. Under these circumstances I have always thought it trite law that, though you might for convenience sake found on the bill for the purposes of your action, yet the real antecedent cause of the action lay behind the bill altogether. I should have thought, too, that one of the very objects of the improvement that was made—if it was an improvement—by the 29th section of the Court of Session Act was just to allow that sort of thing to be done in one action which could not have been done, prior to the date of that statute, without having two actions.

There is the case of Stirling v. Lang,[1] which I think is a very good illustration of the defects under the old procedure which were meant to be obviated by the new procedure under the Court of Session Act. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the amendment that was allowed by the Lord Ordinary setting forth the circumstances under which the bill was granted and putting in the alternative conclusion is a perfectly proper amendment under the Act of 1868. If that be so, it follows from what I have said that in my view arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa is a perfectly proper foundation for that action.

If I am right so far, the only question remaining is whether the pursuer made out her case under the amendment that was made. I am of opinion that she did make out her case. I am not going back on the rule well established that you cannot prove a loan except scripto vel juramento. But I think here you have the scriptum. You have the cheque. Now, under Haldane v. Speirs,[2] a cheque will not prove a loan, but it will prove the passing of money. It is said here that the way in which the cheque was dealt with was to reduce the cheque to what one of the witnesses called the position of a piece of waste paper. I think that an absolutely unwarrantable comment. The way in which they chose to put the transaction in the books did not treat the cheque as it would have been in order in that lady's account. But I am bound to say that unless they had the warrant of the cheque, they would have had no warrant for the proceedings at all. The cheque proves the passing of money. Quo animo did that money pass? That also under Haldane v. Speirs[2] must be proved in writing. But I think this must also be held to be proved by writ. In the first place, you find pencil jottings on the ledger account. We were referred by Mr Wilson to Wink's case.[3] That is a totally different case. There is no law I know that entries in an account may not be in pencil as well as in ink. Of course you may look on them with suspicion when made with pencil, and under Wink's case[3] you may say they are not proper entries. Here no doubt it is a post entry, but it is an entry in the books of the Company, and you have No. 82, which, I think, is raised by the minute of parties here into the position of being an undoubted writ of the defenders' Company. Taking all these documents together, I have no hesitation in saying that I regard this loan as proved. If that is so, there is an end of the action.

Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord M'Laren, having heard only part of the argument, gave no opinion.

Sec. 70. [Promoters of the undertaking not to be entitled to minerals.] "The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal . . . or other minerals under any lands purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug, or carried away, or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby."

certain dates between 4th June 1887 and 5th October 1901, gave notice to the trustees requiring them to leave unworked freestone rock, clay, and blaes vested in them as trustees foresaid in certain areas of ground at Bothwell Park Quarry, in the parish of Bothwell and county of Lanark, near the said company's line of railway.

The trustees and the Caledonian Railway Company also agreed that certain sums, amounting in all to £4578, 4s. 4d., should be the amount of compensation to be paid to the trustees for leaving unworked the freestone, clay, and blaes in the several areas.

The Caledonian Railway Company further, in virtue of the said statute, intimated to the trustees in May and September 1901 that they desired certain blocks of coal belonging to the trustees to be left unworked for the support of certain culverts over a stream on the railway line. The trustees and the Caledonian Railway Company agreed that the compensation payable to the pursuers for leaving unworked the said blocks of coal should be £444, 0s. 7d.

A question having arisen between the trustees and the Caledonian Railway Company as to the nature and extent of their respective rights and interests in the said freestone, clay, blaes, and coal, which was to be left unworked in compliance with the notices above mentioned, a special case was presented to which the parties were (1) the Duke of Hamilton's trustees, first parties, and (2) the Caledonian Railway Company, second parties.

The first parties maintained that they were not divested of their right of property in the said minerals by the notices or payment of compensation under and in terms of section 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and that the second parties on payment of the compensation were not entitled to a conveyance of the said minerals.

The second parties maintained that under sections 70 and 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and in accordance with the general practice in Scotland since the passing of that Act,* they were, in respect of the compensation agreed to be paid, entitled to have the first parties divested of the property in the said minerals by a conveyance thereof to be granted by the first parties to the second parties in terms of section 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

The question for the opinion of the Court was:—"Are the second parties entitled to demand from the first parties a conveyance of the minerals above mentioned on payment of the compensation due therefor under section 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845?"

It was stated at the bar that the sum of compensation agreed on had been paid by the second parties to the first parties.

Argued for the first parties;—On a true construction of section 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the effect of the notice and counter notice, followed by the railway company making compensation, was not to make the railway company proprietors of the minerals, but merely to put the landowner under an obligation not to work the minerals. The opinions expressed in English cases with reference to the corresponding sections 77-81 of the English Act (8 and 9 Vict. c. 20),—which with verbal differences were similar to sections 70-74 of the Scots Act—shewed that in England these statutory provisions were not construed as vesting the railway company with the property in the minerals.[1] What was paid was "compensation" for not working, not a "price" for the minerals, and what was acquired was a right of support, not a right of property.[2]

The provisions of section 74 are set out in the opinion of the Lord President.

Argued for the second parties;—The practice in Scotland since 1845 had been for the railway company to obtain a conveyance of the minerals on making payment of compensation under sec. 71 of the Act.[3] The use of the expression "purchased" in sec. 74 of the Act—in which reference was made to "minerals not purchased by the company"—shewed that what was contemplated in sec. 71 was the transfer of the property in the minerals on compensation being paid. In several Scots cases Judges had spoken of the transaction as a "purchase" or "acquisition" of the minerals.[4] The railway company was entitled to give its counter notice at any time before the minerals were worked, and the fasciculus of the sections of the statute dealing with this matter must be read together.[5] The English decisions referred to by the first parties were not on this point, and the dicta were obiter.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case in which the point is a very short one. The Caledonian Railway Company with one of their lines go through the property belonging to the other parties to the case,—the trustees of the late Duke of Hamilton. They intimated to the trustees in May and September 1901 that they desired certain minerals under certain portions of their line to be left unworked; and accordingly that was done, and compensation was settled and paid in the ordinary way. The point at issue now between them is whether, that compensation having been admittedly paid, the Railway Company are entitled to obtain from the trustees a conveyance of the materials. This conveyance the trustees, for reasons which I assume to be quite sufficient, do not wish to grant.

The point, therefore, rises shortly upon the provisions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. The fasciculus of sections dealing with that matter begins at section 70. Section 70 enacts that the Company are not to be entitled to any mines under land purchased by them unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and that all such mines shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of said lands; and then section 71 proceeds, that "if the owner, lessee, or occupier . . . be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the Company notice in writing of his intention so to do . . ." And thereupon if the Company thinks the working of the mines is likely to damage the works of the railway, "they shall give notice to such owner . . . that they desire that it be not worked, and in such cases such owner, lessee, or occupier shall not work or get the minerals comprised in such notice, and the Company shall make compensation for the same . . ." Section 82 provides that if the Railway Company is unwilling to pay compensation, then the owner may work the mines; and there are certain other sections dealing with matters which have to do with the same things.

Now, it seems to me that the whole scheme of the Act is to exempt minerals from purchase unless they are specially purchased, that is to say, unless an ordinary notice to take is given, and the provision in the 71st section of compensation for leaving unworked materially differs from a purchase scheme, and particularly in these two criteria,—first, that the notice to take must be of course within the limits of deviation, whereas the notice under the 71st section may be forty yards beyond the limits of deviation. And then the second point of divergence that I see is this, that notice to take cannot be given after the time when the compulsory powers have expired, whereas the scheme of notice and counter notice under section 71 is applicable after the Railway Company commences to work the railway. Now, I think really that consideration ends the question.

Indeed, the only argument I could find that the Railway Company have was the argument based on some words that are used in the 74th section. Now, section 74 is a general section which provides for the Railway Company making compensation to owners of mines for injuries done to them by severance or by the continuous working of the mines being interrupted by the railway, and it is in these terms:—"The Company shall from time to time pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier of any such mines extending so as to be on both sides of the railway, all such additional expenses and losses as shall be incurred by such owner, lessee, or occupier by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway, or of the continuous working of such mines being interrupted as aforesaid, or by reason of the same being worked in such a manner and under such restrictions as not to prejudice or injure the railway, and for any minerals not purchased by the Company which cannot be obtained by reason of making and maintaining the railway." And it is said the use of the word "purchase" introduced here meant the proper transference which ought to be accompanied by a conveyance. The simple answer I think is that the word "purchase" refers back to the words used in the side-note of sections 71 and 72, where the expression is used that "if the Company is willing to purchase" the "minerals," or "if the Company is unwilling to purchase." But that of course is a mere description of the form used in the section, and sends you back to see what is done in the section itself; and when you come to the section itself you do not have a scheme of proper conveyance at all, but this scheme of notice and counter notice. Therefore I venture to think there is no provision here for transference of mines.

I may say I am considerably fortified in this matter by, I will not say the judgments, but the dicta of Judges in giving judgment in several English cases. There is the case of Errington v. The Metropolitan District Railway.[1] The case itself, I may say, merely decided that under a notice to take you must serve a special notice for minerals; but then the whole matter was discussed, and in particular the 78th section of the English Act, which is the equivalent of the 71st section of the Scottish Act, was considered, and Lord Justice Brett there says, "Under the 78th section after the compensation has been paid by the Railway Company, the minerals do not belong to the Railway Company. They continue to be the property of the landowner. The Railway Company cannot touch the minerals." And in the same way, in the case of the Great Northern Railway Company v. The Inland Revenue Commissioners, affirmed in L. R. [1901], 1 King's Bench, 416, I find that on page 427 Lord Justice Collins, speaking again of this section, says, "No 'property' and 'no estate or interest in any property' was transferred to or vested in a purchaser. All that happened was that the mineowner came under a statutory obligation not to work or get a certain defined portion of coal which continued to be his own property."

Now, these are opinions which of course are not binding on us, but are of very great weight so far as the argument on this use of the word "purchase" is concerned. That was equally plain there, for you will find just the same use of "purchase" in the section of the English Act which is the counterpart of section 74 of the Scottish Act. For these reasons I am of opinion that your Lordships should answer the question in the negative.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is certain that there are no express words in the Scottish Act giving a railway company or a public company, as it may be, a right to demand a conveyance in exchange for payment of compensation for minerals. In this respect the statutory provision stands in marked contrast to the provisions regulating the acquisition of lands, where the acquirer of the lands is entitled to a conveyance, and the form of the conveyance is prescribed by the statute. I cannot help thinking that this was not an undesigned omission, but, on the contrary, that for a reason that I shall immediately indicate it was not intended that a company acquiring a right to have the minerals left unwrought should also be entitled to a conveyance as on a purchase. The key to the interpretation I think is furnished by Lord Selborne's opinion in the case of Dixon v. The Caledonian and Glasgow and South-Western Railway Companies,[2] where that very eminent and learned Judge says that even if a company pay compensation they have not a right to work the minerals for which they have paid. Following Lord Selborne's opinion, I can come to no other conclusion than that the compensation was to be paid merely for support, and that a company which makes a payment is not to be entitled to a conveyance which would entitle the company if it thought proper to sell the minerals. As long as they are not allowed to sell the minerals the company is not likely to claim anything more than is necessary for the support of the line, and that is all that was intended by statute that it should get. There are some other dicta on the subject in the Scottish cases, but none of them appear to touch this point. I notice that in the case of Nisbet Hamilton,[1] Lord Adam uses the word "purchase," but then he is speaking about the right to acquire mines above formation level which is an incident of the original purchase of the lands, and that cannot be cited as an authority in aid of the contention of the Company in this case. In another case,—I think the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Henderson,[2]—Lord President Inglis speaks of the company acquiring the minerals. I do not know that this expression goes very far, because a company certainly acquires the minerals for a purpose—for the purpose of support, and that really does not touch the question whether the company is entitled to all the rights which a proprietor holding a conveyance would have. And then there is Lord Fullerton's dictum in the case of the Barrhead Railway Company,[3] which seems to me to be just as inconclusive as all the rest.

In these circumstances, so far as authority is concerned, I agree with your Lordship in the chair in attaching greater weight to the English decision in which the point was raised at all events by clear implication; and I think the same observation may be made with reference to Lord Selborne's opinion in Dixon's[4] case, because his Lordship would not have come to the conclusion that the Company was not entitled to work the minerals if he had thought that they were to get a conveyance that would give them all the rights of heritable proprietors. I therefore agree that the first question should be answered in favour of the Duke of Hamilton's trustees.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am very clearly of the same opinion, for the reasons your Lordship has given.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

to ordain the appellant to print and box the note of appeal and relative documents, and also to find caution for the expenses of the appeal.

The Court ordained the appellant to print and box within ten days, under certification that, if he failed to do so, the appeal would be dismissed, but refused to order him to find caution.

IN a petition by James Heddle, a bankrupt, for his discharge the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians (Guy) pronounced, on 12th April 1905, the following interlocutor:—" . . . Finds that it is admitted by the petitioner (1) that he presented a petition for his discharge to this Court on 24th March 1904, averring that no dividend had been paid to his creditors, but that his failure to pay 5s. in the £ had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible; (2) that in that petition the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor dated 4th May 1904, . . . found that the petitioner had failed to prove that the failure to pay a dividend of 5s. per £ out of his estate had arisen from circumstances for which he could not be justly held responsible, and therefore refused the petition, and dismissed the same; (3) that the petitioner appealed against said interlocutor to the First Division of the Court of Session; (4) that, by interlocutor dated 21st June 1904, the Lords . . . refused the appeal; and (5) that the petitioner's estates have yielded no dividend, and the creditors have recovered nothing: Therefore finds that in respect of the provisions contained in section 6 of the Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, the present petition is incompetent: Refuses the petitioner's motion for leave to amend the petition or to sist the same: Refuses the petition, and decerns."

James Heddle appealed to the First Division.

On 28th June 1905 Melrose-Drover, Limited, and others, the respondents in the appeal, presented a note to the Lord President setting forth that the note of appeal lodged by Heddle was dated 20th April 1905; that in order that the rights of parties might be finally settled and the interlocutor appealed against either affirmed or recalled, it was desirable that the necessary papers be printed and boxed to the Court forthwith; and that, in respect the appellant was an undischarged bankrupt, he should be ordained to find caution for the expenses of the appeal. They accordingly prayed the Court to "ordain the appellant, the said James Heddle, to print and box to the Court within ten days the note of appeal, petition, interlocutors, and such productions as he intends to found upon in support of the appeal; and further, to ordain the appellant to find caution for the expenses of the appeal, and that within ten days."

Counsel for the respondents stated that the respondents' agents had written to Heddle, on 2d June and on 12th June, requesting him to print the note of appeal and other necessary documents, but that he had failed to do so, and had taken no steps to prosecute the appeal; that the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, which, in section 3, prescribed the course to be followed by an appellant in the matter of printing and boxing, was not applicable to appeals under the Bankruptcy Acts,[1] and accordingly, in order to have the appeal disposed of, the respondents found it necessary to present the present note.

Heddle stated that he was prepared to box the note of appeal and other necessary documents, but maintained that in the circumstances printing should be dispensed with, and that the appeal should be allowed to proceed without his finding caution. He referred to the undernoted authorities.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a note by the respondents in an appeal taken by Mr Heddle in a petition at his instance for discharge. The process is not before your Lordships, but the note brings the facts sufficiently to your Lordships' cognisance.

It appears that, roughly speaking, more than a year ago Mr Heddle petitioned for his discharge. This discharge was refused, and an appeal was taken by him to this Division of the Court. By interlocutor, dated 21st June 1904, your Lordships adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and confirmed the finding that Mr Heddle was not entitled to his discharge. After a lapse of nearly a year Mr Heddle presented a new application for discharge. That petition was dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute as incompetent. Against that decision Mr Heddle took an appeal, and in that appeal he has not moved up till now.

Such appeals do not fall within the Act of Sederunt relative to the Court of Session Act, 1868, so that this application is made to your Lordships' common law right to direct the procedure in your own Court, in order that the appeal may be in some way disposed of.

The prayer of the note is "to ordain the appellant, the said James Heddle, to print and box to the Court within ten days the note of appeal, petition, interlocutors, and such productions as he intends to found upon in support of the appeal; and further, to ordain the appellant to find caution for the expenses of the appeal, and that within ten days."

Mr Heddle resists the application so far as printing and finding caution are concerned. He is prepared to box.

I am of opinion that, so far as the first point goes, the prayer of the note should be granted. I think a person who presents a petition under the circumstances stated in the note, and having that petition dismissed, and not having moved in the matter for a considerable time, ought to be subject to the usual orders for expediting procedure. I would propose therefore that Mr Heddle should be ordained to print and box within ten days, under certification that if he fails to do so the appeal will be dismissed. I see no reason for dispensing with the ordinary rules of this Court that appeals should be printed.

I am not prepared to grant the prayer of the note quoad finding caution. This is a petition by a bankrupt for his own discharge, and that is in a different position from a litigation by him about other matters. I do not think that a bankrupt applying for his discharge should be hampered by being ordered by the Court to find caution.

I am therefore for refusing the second part of the prayer of the note.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Ordain

Blyth Scholarship Fund Trustees v. University Court of St Andrews.

UNIVERSITY COURT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ST ANDREWS, Respondents.—Irvine.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—University—Bursary—Bursary to "one or other of the Colleges of St Andrews"—Subsequent affiliation of another college with the University of St Andrews.—A Dundee lady, who died in 1880, by her trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1878, conveyed a fund to trustees "for the purpose of establishing one or more bursaries in either one or other of the colleges of St Andrews," as her trustees might determine. In 1880 the University of St Andrews consisted of two colleges—the United College and St Mary's College. In 1897 the University College of Dundee (instituted in 1881) was affiliated to and became part of the University of St Andrews.

Held, on a construction of the settlement, that the bequest was conceived in favour only of the two colleges of St Andrews existing at the date of the testator's death, and that her trustees were not entitled to extend the benefit of the bequest to the University College of Dundee.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—University—Bursary—Female Students.—A testator, who died in 1880, by her trust-disposition and settlement left a fund to trustees for the establishment of bursaries for "students" in the University of St Andrews. In 1880 the University of St Andrews was open to male students only, but in 1892, under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, it was opened to female students also.

Held that under the settlement the trustees had authority to admit female students in St Andrews to the benefits of the trust, there being nothing in the settlement to shew that the testator intended that female students should be excluded.

2D DIVISION.

MRS AGNES CARMICHAEL OR BLYTH, widow of Mr Charles Blyth, engineer, Dundee, residing at Castle Garden, Crail, died on 9th February 1880, leaving a settlement, dated 14th June 1878, by which she conveyed her whole estate to her brother David Carmichael, engineer, Dundee, and appointed him, subject to the legacies and provisions therein made, to be her sole and universal legatory.

The third purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement was in the following terms:—"Thirdly. For the purpose of establishing one or more bursaries in either one or other of the colleges of St Andrews as the trustees after named may determine, I direct the said David Carmichael as soon as conveniently may be after my death to sell" certain heritable property, and to invest the proceeds "in name of himself and William Scott, solicitor, Dundee, and the survivor of them, as trustees or trustee, for the purposes after mentioned, . . . and I appoint the said trustees or trustee, and such other trustee or trustees as may be assumed to continue said trust as after mentioned, to be the patrons or patron of said bursary or bursaries, and that the said David Carmichael and William Scott, or survivor of them, shall as soon as conveniently may be after ascertaining the clear capital sum so to be laid out and invested, fix and determine the number of bursaries so to be established; and I further appoint that the said patrons or patron shall so soon as convenient after determining the number of bursaries, and thereafter from time to time as often as a vacancy or vacancies may occur, nominate and present to the said bursaries a student for each qualified in manner after mentioned, which students so nominated and presented shall be entitled to the yearly produce of said sum so invested equally among them, . . . and that for such number of years, not exceeding four years, as the said David Carmichael and William Scott, or the survivor of them, may determine; and in nominating and presenting students as aforesaid, I appoint the said patrons or patron to prefer, in the first place, such as are of the kindred of my said late husband, and failing such, such as are of my own kindred, secondly, such as are of the name of Blyth, thirdly, such as are of the name of Carmichael, and failing students of the above kindred or name then such as shall be found best qualified and most deserving of the same; and for the perpetuation of said bursaries I hereby direct the said David Carmichael and William Scott, or survivor of them, either to assume new trustees into said trust so as there shall always be three trustees in the management of said trust after the death of the survivor of the said David Carmichael and William Scott, and which trust shall be continued in all time coming by the assumption of new trustees, or in the option of the said David Carmichael and William Scott, or survivor of them, they may and are hereby empowered by such deed or writing as may be necessary to appoint, that the said trust shall be perpetuated in all time coming after the death of the survivor of them in the persons of the Principal and Professors of the said college for the time, under such regulations, in addition to those above specified, as the said David Carmichael and William Scott, or survivor of them, may consider judicious. . . . Declaring that the said bursary or bursaries shall in all time be denominated and known by the name of the 'Blyth Scholarship.'"

The property specified in the third purpose was sold, and a sum of £970 was realised and invested in the names of David Carmichael (the survivor of the two trustees named in the third purpose) and three other persons, as the trustees and patrons of the Blyth Scholarship Fund. The income was about £45 a year.

On 12th April 1882 the trustees and patrons by minute resolved as follows:—"1st. To establish two bursaries of equal amount in terms of the trust-deed. 2d. That each bursary be tenable for three years. 3d. That students while holding the bursaries shall attend the United College of St Andrews. 4th. That one of the bursaries be open for competition this year, and the other next year. 5th. That the trustees and patrons reserve to themselves to decide from time to time when applications come before them, how far, having regard to the terms of the trust-deed, and to the qualifications of the applicants, preference is to be given to candidates who may be relatives of the founder, or who may bear the name of Blyth or Carmichael. 6th. It was reserved for further consideration what subjects candidates should be examined upon, and when and where and by whom the examination should be conducted."

At the date of the truster's death the University of St Andrews consisted of two colleges, viz., the United College of St Salvator and St Leonard and St Mary's College; but by Ordinance No. 46, dated 3d February 1894, of the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 55), and approved in terms of that Act by Order in Council on 15th January 1897, the University College of Dundee, which had been founded in 1881, was affiliated to and made to form part of the University of St Andrews subject to the conditions in the agreement between the University of St Andrews and the University College of Dundee, set forth in Schedule I. annexed to the Ordinance.

Further, at the date of the truster's death the Scottish Universities were not open to women, but the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 14, gave the University Commissioners power to enable each university to admit women, and in virtue of that power women were for the first time admitted as students of St Andrews University in 1892.

On 18th May 1905 the trustees and patrons of the Blyth Scholarship Fund (David Carmichael named in the settlement being one of their number) presented a petition, in which they prayed the Court "to authorise the petitioners and their successors in office in the administration of the Blyth Scholarship Fund to extend the benefits thereof (first) to students attending the University College of Dundee as well as the United College of St Salvator and St Leonard and the College of St Mary's, being Colleges of the University of St Andrews, as the petitioners and their foresaids may determine from time to time, and (second) to female students attending one or other of the said colleges."

The petitioners stated;—The truster was a native of Dundee, and belonged to a family of engineers, whose business was and had always been in Dundee. Her father and her husband had been engineers in Dundee, and her brother, the petitioner David Carmichael, was also an engineer there. In making regulations for carrying out the objects of the truster's benefaction it was the desire of the trustees and patrons, in accordance with what they believed would have had the full approval of the truster, that students attending classes in science or engineering should participate in the benefits thereof. But at the outset of their administration there was no course of instruction given in these branches at the University of St Andrews. The University College of Dundee being now one of the Colleges of the University of St Andrews, the petitioners are desirous of extending the benefits of the Blyth Scholarship Fund to students of that college, "but as it is doubtful whether it can be regarded as one of the Colleges of the University of St Andrews in the sense of the truster's settlement, the petitioners, for their safety in the administration of the fund, desire to obtain the authority of the Court to their extending the benefits of the fund to students of that college, so that there may be no doubt of their powers. The admission of students of the University College of Dundee to participate in the benefits of the fund would not, as the petitioners believe, be against the intention of the truster, but the reverse, and they submit that it would not be inconsistent with the provisions of her settlement. Upon such authority being given, the petitioners would be enabled to give effect to the views of the original trustees and patrons by selecting, when occasion offered, students attending classes in science and engineering for the benefits of the fund, as the University College of Dundee is well equipped for such instruction."

Blyth Scholarship Fund Trustees v. University Court of St Andrews.

The petitioners further submitted that the extension of the benefits of the fund to women was not opposed to the intention of the truster, and was not inconsistent with her settlement.

Answers were lodged by the University Court of the University of St Andrews. The respondents objected to the extension of the benefits of the fund to students of the University College, Dundee, on the grounds (1) that it was inconsistent with the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement; (2) that a discretionary power having been entrusted by the truster to David Carmichael, the survivor of the trustees named in the trust-disposition and settlement, to determine the College of St Andrews in which the bursaries were to be established, and he, in exercise of that power, having determined that students holding the bursaries should attend the United College of St Andrews, power should not be conferred on the petitioners to alter this determination; and (3) that under the provisions of Ordinance No. 46 of the Scottish University Commissioners and the agreement scheduled thereto, the fund, having been bequeathed to and vested in the United College of St Andrews prior to the date of that ordinance, was appropriated to the use of the United College of St Andrews, and the bursaries having been at the date of the ordinance attached to the United College of St Andrews, should continue to be tenable only by students there.*

With respect to the admission of women students to the benefits of the fund, the respondents set forth in their answers sec. 14, subsec. (1), of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, and secs. 1 and 2 of Ordinance No. 58 of the Scottish Universities Commissioners;† but the

* The respondents specially founded on the following clauses in the agreement set forth in the schedule annexed to Ordinance No. 46:—

Clause 8. "All the funds and estates at present belonging to the University of St Andrews as now existing, or to either of its present colleges, shall continue to be appropriated to university and college uses respectively in St Andrews, and all funds which are or shall be vested in or bequeathed to the said University, or to either of the said Colleges, by any deed or writing dated on or before the 31st December 1890, shall, if bequeathed for specific purposes, be appropriated to the purposes for which they have been bequeathed, and if bequeathed without designation of a specific purpose, shall be devoted to the further endowment of the offices of the principals, professors, lecturers, and class assistants, and to other university or college uses in St Andrews, and all funds thereafter gifted or bequeathed to either of the Colleges of the University of St Andrews at St Andrews shall also be devoted to the use of the College in St Andrews to which they are gifted or bequeathed."

Clause 10. "Subject to the provisions of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, the scholarships, fellowships, and bursaries now attached to the Colleges and the University of St Andrews shall continue to be tenable only by students studying at St Andrews, and the scholarships, fellowships, and bursaries existing at Dundee shall be tenable only by students studying there."

† The Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 14, subsec. (1), limits the powers of the Commissioners in regulating bursaries, &c. to those "which have taken effect for more than twenty-five years previously to the passing of this Act, or if given within less than twenty-five years are wholly or partially inoperative or dormant, or which they may be asked to revise and regulate by the Senatus Academicus and the founder of the trust conjointly, with the approval of the University Court."

Blyth Scholarship Fund Trustees v University Court of St Andrews.

Argued for the petitioners;—The petition was described as a petition to extend the benefits of the fund, but the petitioners did not mean to appeal to the nobile officium of the Court; they did not suggest that the trust had become unworkable owing to change of circumstances; it was simply a question of the construction of the testator's settlement, it being kept in view that the trust was a trust for charitable purposes. In the case of a trust for charitable purposes the trustees were entitled to come to the Court for guidance as to the extent of their powers. On a fair construction of the settlement, University College, Dundee, was entitled to share in the benefits of the fund. It was now "one or other of the Colleges of St Andrews," although it was not so at the date of the settlement or of the testator's death. Had a third college been instituted in the town of St Andrews, and been incorporated with the University, such third college would have exactly corresponded with the language of the bequest, and it did not make any difference that the third college was situated locally in Dundee, especially considering that the testator was a Dundee lady whose family circumstances raised a strong presumption that she would have favoured the Dundee college had it existed in her lifetime. Practically the bequest was for the benefit of students in the University of St Andrews, and had the bequest been in terms so expressed that would have meant the University of St Andrews as it was extended or otherwise altered from time to time. It was said that according to the scheme of the trust the favoured college was to be fixed once for all by the two trustees named in the settlement, or by the survivor of them, and that the survivor of the trustees named, Mr Carmichael, having determined that the United College should be the favoured college, it was ultra vires of the trustees thereafter to alter that determination. As a matter of fact the minute of 12th April 1882, by which it was determined that the bursaries should be held by students of the United College, was the minute not of Mr Carmichael only, but of Mr Carmichael and the three trustees who had been assumed by him. That minute proceeded on a sound view of the trustees' powers. It was within the power of the trustees, original or assumed, in the exercise of their discretion, from time to time, to confine the bursaries to the students of any one college or to throw the bursaries open to the students of two or of all the colleges. It was further said that to give the students of University College, Dundee, the benefit of the fund would be to violate the agreement between the University of St Andrews and University College, Dundee. It certainly did not violate clause 8 of the agreement, which referred only to funds "belonging to" the University of St Andrews or to "either of its present colleges," and to funds "vested in or bequeathed to" the said university or either of its said colleges. "Now attached" in clause 10 might have a wider and vaguer meaning, but taking it so, if it was within the powers of the trustees, on a construction of the settlement, to extend the benefit of the fund to students at the Dundee College, then the fund was not "attached" to St Andrews University or to either of its two original colleges.

There was nothing in the settlement to shew that the testator intended to confine her bequest to men students; it was within the power of the trustees therefore to admit women students to the benefits of the bequest.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—The respondents opposed the petition in so far as it related to the admission of students at University College, Dundee, to the benefit of the fund. (1) University College, Dundee, was not "either one or other of the colleges of St Andrews." It was not locally situated in St Andrews, and it was not in existence at the date of the settlement or of the testator's death. To admit students at University College, Dundee, therefore, would be inconsistent with the plain language of the settlement. Had the bequest been for the establishment of bursaries "at the University of St Andrews," a different question would have arisen. It might then have been argued with force that the extension of St Andrews University by the inclusion of new colleges had the effect of extending the benefit of this bequest to such new colleges. But it was plain from the whole language of the bequest that it was not a bequest for the benefit of St Andrews University as such, nor for the benefit of both the two existing colleges at St Andrews, but only for the benefit of one or the other of these two colleges. (2) The particular college to be favoured was left to the determination of the two trustees named in the settlement or the survivor of them. These trustees were empowered either to create a continuing trust for the management of the fund, or to constitute a trust for that purpose "in the persons of the principal and professors of the said college," i.e., of the particular college chosen. Had the latter alternative been adopted by the trustees named in the settlement the present question could hardly have arisen. The survivor of the two trustees named in the settlement had determined that the United College should be the favoured college. That determination was irrevocable. Where there was delectus personæ in regard to the trustees upon whom discretionary powers were conferred, these powers could not be exercised by assumed trustees.[2] Here the powers relating to the inception of the trust—and in particular the power to determine which should be the favoured college—were plainly conferred on the two trustees named, as individuals specially selected for the purpose of starting the trust, and when they or the survivor of them had exercised those powers and so started the trust, that exercise was final; thereafter the trustees—original or assumed—had merely the ordinary powers of trust management. It was true that the three assumed trustees signed the minute of 12th April 1882, but that minute derived its whole force from the signature of Mr Carmichael, the surviving original trustee. (3) Further, to extend the benefits of the trust to University College, Dundee, would be to violate the agreement between the University of St Andrews and University College, Dundee. It was a condition of the affiliation that bursaries now attached to the colleges at St Andrews should continue to be tenable only by students studying at St Andrews (clause 10). This fund was certainly "attached" to the United College in the sense of clause 10. It was contrary to the agreement on which the application proceeded that bursaries attached to one college should be made available to another college, and none the less because the fund so attached was held on a separate trust.

With respect to the admission of women the position of the respondents was this:—As a matter of policy they favoured the admission of women to their bursaries; they therefore left it to the Court to say whether, looking to the terms of Ordinance No. 58 of the University Commissioners, particularly section 2, it was competent for the trustees to admit women to the benefit of the fund.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The purpose of the testator as set forth in her settlement was to establish one or more bursaries in either one or other of the colleges of St Andrews as the trustees might determine. That refers plainly to the colleges existing then in St Andrews and in no other place, there being in fact at that time no colleges connected with the University of St Andrews in any other town. It is not necessary to decide whether both or only one of the colleges in St Andrews could share in the bursaries. The only question raised is whether the University College of Dundee, which has now been affiliated and brought into corporation with the colleges of St Andrews, is entitled to the benefit of this bequest. I am clearly of opinion that it would be inconsistent with the testator's intention that the bursaries should be available for a college which was not one of the colleges in St Andrews at the time when she made her settlement, which is not now situated in St Andrews, and which has only recently been affiliated to the St Andrews University. This is sufficient for the decision of the case.

As to the question of the admission of women, I am of opinion that the bursaries may be thrown open to them. It is true that the bequest only refers to students who then were eligible, and who of course were males only. But conditions have now altered, and there is nothing in the settlement to indicate, any more than there was in the case of the Clark Bursary Fund,[1] that the testator would have been opposed to the admission of women to the benefit of her bounty if they were admissible as students.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. This is described as a petition to extend the benefits of a certain bequest. It is not suggested that the Court has power to extend the purposes or alter the conditions of the bequest as expressed in the settlement, but, as explained by the counsel for the petitioners, the object of the petition is to obtain a declaration by the Court as to the extent of the trustees' powers under the settlement. What we have to decide therefore is simply whether the trustees have power to extend the benefits of certain bursaries at present confined to students attending the United College at St Andrews to students attending the University College, Dundee. The trustees claim to have this power because the college at Dundee is now one of the colleges composing the University of St Andrews, and though the bursary is limited to students attending "one or other of the colleges of St Andrews," they maintain that that may now be read as including the college at Dundee although it was not one of the colleges of St Andrews at the date of the death of the testatrix. Several answers have been made to this contention. It is said, in the first place, that, as the result of a certain determination made by the trustees in 1882 under a power in the settlement, the benefits of the bursary were confined, and confined finally, not only to students attending one or other of the two colleges at St Andrews, but to students attending the United College at St Andrews. Another answer is that the University College at Dundee forms part of the University of St Andrews only on certain conditions, one of which is that "the bursaries now attached to the colleges and the University of St Andrews shall continue to be tenable only by students studying at St Andrews." But the primary and perhaps best answer is that, on a just construction of the trust-settlement, the bequest is conceived in favour only of the colleges of St Andrews existing at the date of the testatrix's death, and so does not include the University College of Dundee. I think that view is correct, and as it is sufficient for the decision of the case, it is unnecessary to consider whether the other grounds of objection are well founded.

As to the question of the admission of females to the benefits of the bursary, I agree with what has been said, and have nothing to add.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I agree with what your Lordship has said both as to the extension of the bursary to the University College of Dundee and as to the admission of females to its benefits.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The testatrix, who founded these bursaries, died in 1880. At that date there were only two colleges at St Andrews, and her bequest is expressed to be "for the purpose of establishing one or more bursaries in either one or other of the colleges of St Andrews." In 1897, seventeen years after her death, the University College of Dundee became part of the University of St Andrews, but it did not thereby become one of "the colleges of St Andrews," for, geographically speaking, it remained a college, not at St Andrews but at Dundee. For that reason I am of opinion that it does not fall within the description of the object of the charity as expressed in the trust-deed. Further, I entirely concur with the argument for the University Court of St Andrews so far as it is founded on the terms of the agreement between St Andrews and Dundee on which the incorporation proceeded, and when the University Court, representing, as they do, both the contracting parties, tell us that they would regard the extension of the bursary to Dundee as a breach of that agreement, I do not think we can disregard their views. But I think it enough for the decision of this case to put it as your Lordship has done, that the bursary is confined to the two colleges existing at the date of the death of the testatrix.

On the other point I agree that females should be admitted to the benefits of the bursaries, for the simple reason that there is nothing in the trust-deed to indicate the intention of the testatrix to confine them to male students.

On the last day allowed for taking an appeal against an award by a Sheriff dismissing a claim for compensation, the claimant's Edinburgh agent telegraphed to the local agent to apply for a case for appeal. The local agent being out of town, his clerk obtained the services of another agent, who went to the Sheriff Court office and wrote on the interlocutor sheet "The pursuer appeals against the foregoing judgment, and requests a case to be stated." He did not set forth any question of law, and he did not make any deposit, having been informed by the clerk in attendance at the Sheriff Court office that a deposit was not necessary. The Sheriff stated a case. At the hearing on the appeal the deposit of £1 had not been made.

The Court, on the objection of the respondents, dismissed the appeal in respect of the appellant's failure to comply with the regulations enacted by sec. 9 (a) of the Act of Sederunt, 3d June 1898.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

JAMES MURPHY, labourer, Edinburgh, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from Blair & White, contractors, Glasgow, the claim was referred to the arbitration of the Sheriff-substitute (Macleod), at Linlithgow, who dismissed the application, and at the request of Murphy stated a case for appeal.

The case, besides stating the facts and the questions of law on the merits, set forth as follows:—"On the submission by the Sheriff-clerk to parties' procurators of the draft stated case it was objected for the respondents that the application to state a case had not been made in accordance with the regulations thereanent laid down by section 9 of the Act of Sederunt of 3d June 1898.* My award is dated 5th May 1905, and the appellant's only application to me to state a case was made by the writing of the following words on the interlocutor sheets at the end of the note to the award, viz.:—

"'Linlithgow, 12th May 1905.—The pursuer appeals against the foregoing judgment, and requests a case to be stated.

'(Signed) PETER MILLER,
'For James Kidd, Pror. for Pursuer.'"

No question of law was stated, and no deposit accompanied the application.

The case further stated:—"At 4.45 P.M. on 12th May 1905, that being the last day allowed for taking an appeal, there was delivered at the office of the Linlithgow correspondent of the appellant's Edinburgh law-agent a telegram from the said law-agent asking his said correspondent to take an appeal. Unfortunately the said correspondent was absent in Glasgow, but his clerk took the telegram to several law offices in vain, but at last found a brother procurator who was able to attend to the matter. Just on the stroke of five o'clock (the usual closing time of the Court offices) the said brother procurator called at the Court offices, and having on his request obtained from the clerk in attendance therein the interlocutor sheets wrote thereon the minute above cited. The said clerk in attendance was asked on behalf of the appellant whether any fee was payable in connection with the taking of the appeal, and in the hurry of the emergency he replied that in respect it was in connection with a workman's compensation matter he thought there was no fee payable. The said brother procurator, who had very little knowledge of the particular case he was dealing with, was satisfied with that assurance. There is no reason to suppose that if the liability for a fee had been present to the mind either of the said brother procurator or the said clerk in attendance it would not at once have been paid, and in these circumstances it seemed to me that it would be a great hardship to the appellant if I refused to state and sign a case. Accordingly, I repelled the respondent's objection to my doing so."

At the hearing the deposit of £1 required by the Act of Sederunt had not been paid.

The respondents, in support of their objection to the competency of the appeal, argued;—Not one of the conditions required by the Act of Sederunt had been complied with, and even if a short indulgence as regarded time might have been permissible, the fact that the deposit of £1 had not been made even now was conclusive against the appellant, for the Court would not consider a process in which the statutory fees had not been paid.

Argued for the appellant;—The only serious objection was the non-payment of the deposit of £1, but for that the clerk, not the appellant's agent, was to blame. The case therefore had been competently stated.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a matter in which it is essential that a certain regularity of procedure should be observed, and for that purpose the Act of Sederunt of 3d June 1898, sec. 9 (a), enacts certain rules which regulate the method to be adopted in an application to a Sheriff to state a case on a question of law. I am clearly of opinion that these rules have not been observed in the present case, and that we cannot therefore consider the appeal which has come before us.

The history of the case is short. On the last day allowed for taking an appeal a telegram was sent to the Linlithgow agent in charge of the case asking him to take the necessary steps to obtain a stated case. Unfortunately he happened to be absent in Glasgow, but his clerk found another practitioner, who went to the Court offices and wrote upon the interlocutor sheet the words, "The pursuer appeals against the foregoing judgment, and requests a case to be stated." This practitioner apparently was not very familiar with the procedure in this matter, for under the Act of Sederunt there are two conditions essential to an application for a stated case—first, the minute of application must set forth the question (or questions) of law which is (or are) proposed as the subject-matter of the case; secondly, the minute must be accompanied by a deposit of £1. Neither of these conditions was complied with, and it appears to me that the party who wished to obtain the stated case must bear the consequences which have arisen from the mistakes or ignorance of those who acted for him. While therefore the fact that no proper minute was lodged is a sufficient ground for the decision I have come to, I may point out that we could not in any event consider this appeal, as the fee of £1 has, I understand, even yet not been paid. The cases to which we were referred in the course of debate were entirely different. If fees have not been timeously lodged owing to circumstances for which those who ought to lodge them are not responsible, as, for example, the impossibility of finding a magistrate or a clerk of Court, then I can well understand that the parties will not be allowed to be prejudiced by a failure for which they were not responsible. I need hardly point out that we have no such case here.

A bill of exchange, dated 15th February 1904, drawn by Ferguson on and accepted by his firm of Ferguson & Company, was indorsed by Ferguson to the Industries Company, by whom it was indorsed to the Manchester Bank.

In December 1904 the Manchester Bank brought an action against Ferguson & Company for payment of the sum in the bill.

Ferguson & Company in defence averred that the pursuers, the Manchester Bank, having made advances to the Industries Company, Ferguson & Company, at a date specified, agreed to give the bill in security of the advance on the condition agreed to by the pursuers, the Manchester Bank, that payment of the advance was not to be demandable until sufficient working capital had been raised by the Industries Company. Ferguson & Company therefore pleaded that they were not liable on the bill, sufficient working capital not having been raised by the Industries Company. The defenders did not state the amount of working capital to be raised, nor any limit of time within which it was to be raised.

Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co., Limited, v. Ferguson & Co.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Held that the defenders' averments were not relevant to be remitted to probation under the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

IN December 1904 the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Alexander Ferguson & Company, 106 and 108 West Regent Street, Glasgow, and Alexander Ferguson and W. Bruce Mount, the partners of that firm, praying for decree against the defenders for £200 (with interest as specified), being the balance alleged to be due on a bill dated 15th February 1904 for £500 at three months, drawn by the defender Ferguson upon and accepted by the defenders Ferguson & Company.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 2) "The said bill was indorsed by the said Alexander Ferguson to The Industries Development Company, Limited, by whom it was indorsed to the pursuers, who are now in right thereof." (Cond. 3) "The defenders, Alexander Ferguson & Company, failed to meet the said bill when it fell due, but they have made" payments to account amounting in all to £300, "leaving a balance of £200 of principal due to the pursuers by the defenders."

The defenders in answer averred that the bill was accepted by Ferguson & Company for the accommodation of The Industries Development Company, Limited. The defenders never received any value in respect of the bill. "Pursuers were aware of this when said bill was indorsed to them, and are not bona fide holders thereof for value without notice. . . . Said bill is held by the pursuers subject to the conditions stated in the statement of facts for the defenders."

In their statement of facts (as amended in the Court of Session) the defenders averred;—(Stat. 1) "The bill for £500 condescended upon is part of an original bill, dated 28th January 1902, amounting to £2500, drawn by The Industries Development Company, Limited, London, on and accepted by the defender Alexander Ferguson, in connection with an advance believed to have been made by the pursuers to The Mines Acquisition and Development Company, Limited, London. The latter company owned a gold mining property situated at Barberton, Transvaal, South Africa, and said advance was made by the pursuers to enable it to pay off a debt. The arrangement made at the time the advance was given was that the advance was to be repaid from the working capital which said company were to raise so soon as the state of the mining market would allow of their doing so successfully. This company, however, was not successful in raising said working capital, and its assets and debts were subsequently taken over by The Industries Development Company, Limited, aforesaid. This latter company having failed also to raise sufficient working capital to repay said advance, an agreement was come to between the pursuers, The Industries Development Company, Limited, and the defender Alexander Ferguson, that the last-mentioned defender should give his guarantee to the pursuers in connection with said advance, which, it was arranged, should not be enforced until said working capital had been raised. The said Alexander Ferguson . . . gave his name to said original bill for £2500 on the faith of said agreement amongst the parties." (Stat. 2) "The said original bill for £2500 was in terms of said agreement renewed from time to time until the beginning of 1903, when the pursuers asked for an additional name to said bill by way of further security, and the said defenders, Alexander Ferguson & Company, agreed to give two bills, dated 3d February 1903, for £2000 and £500 respectively, which were to be renewed from time to time, on the condition, agreed to by the pursuers, that payment of said advance was not to be demandable until said working capital had been raised to pay off same. The bill of which the sum now sued for is part was the last renewal so granted on 15th February 1904 for £500. The bills so far as cancelled and a statement shewing the whole bill transactions are produced. Said agreement above condescended on was made on or about 3d February 1903 at the pursuers' London office between Thomas Ferguson, their London manager, and Mr David Philip, S.S.C., on behalf of the defenders." (Stat. 4) "Although under no obligation to do so, in view of the agreement subsisting between the parties, the defender Alexander Ferguson, who had financed said Industries Development Company during the past two years, paid to the pursuers on account of this original bill for £2500 sums amounting in all to £2300, besides paying interest on the principal sum, and he has also spent a further sum of about £2000 in registering a new company, called The Scotia Development Company, Limited, for the purpose of raising said working capital, and negotiations are presently pending for the sale of the entire share capital of this new company." (Stat. 5) "The pursuers . . . are only entitled to claim against the said Alexander Ferguson & Company and The Industries Development Company, Limited, upon sufficient moneys being subscribed for working capital in connection with said gold mining property."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The bill sued on being accepted by the defenders, Alexander Ferguson & Company, merely for the accommodation of The Industries Development Company, Limited, and being indorsed to and accepted by the pursuers, in the knowledge thereof, the pursuers have no claim against the defenders, Alexander Ferguson & Company. (4) The bill founded on having been accepted by the pursuers on condition that they were not to ask payment until working capital had been raised by The Industries Development Company, Limited, and that capital not having been raised, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The pursuers denied the agreement averred by the defenders, and pleaded, inter alia, that the defenders' statements were irrelevant (a) in respect of want of specification in regard to said agreement; (b) in respect that parole evidence contradictory of the terms of the bill sued on was incompetent.

On 2d February 1905 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences as irrelevant, and decerns against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds them liable to the pursuers in expenses: Allows," &c.

On 28th March 1905 the Sheriff (Guthrie), on appeal, adhered.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The meaning of the agreement averred in defence was that the defenders were to be liable on the bill only if working capital was never raised for the working of this gold mining property—only if all attempt to raise working capital was abandoned. So long as there was a chance of raising working capital, the defenders' liability on the bill was to be suspended—that was to say, it could be met by a renewal bill without interest. Under the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it was competent to prove this agreement by parole. The question raised by the defence was certainly a question of liability on a bill, and the Act said that any fact which was relevant to any such question might be proved by parole. Therefore upon a literal reading of the Act it was competent so to prove the agreement here averred. It was, however, impossible to dispute that upon the construction of the Act there were two currents of authority—one which limited the Act to questions of liability as between the drawer and the acceptor, or at the most sanctioned parole proof of agreements with the holder under which the liability of the acceptor or the drawer to the holder was suspended for a definite time; the other, which sanctioned parole proof of agreements under which the liability of the drawer or the acceptor to the holder was suspended indefinitely, or even of agreements under which such liability was negatived absolutely. In the National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Co.,[1] which was an action by the holders of an unaccepted bill against the drawers, the defence was that under an arrangement with the drawees, of which the holders had knowledge, the drawers were in no event to be liable on the bill. The First Division of the Court, reversing the judgment of Lord Wellwood, who had adopted the more liberal construction of the Act, held that this defence could not be admitted to probation, and Lord President Inglis and Lord M'Laren undoubtedly proceeded on the ground that the Act did not make it competent for the drawers to contradict by parole evidence their liability on the face of the bill as in a question with the holders, but Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear, while concurring in the judgment, proceeded on the ground that the agreement averred in defence had reference only to bills which had been accepted by the drawees, and Lord Adam expressed a very decided opinion in favour of the more liberal construction of the Act. Gibson's Trustees v. Galloway,[2] where the other Division again refused to allow parole proof of an agreement, was not really decided upon a construction of the Act, and Lord M'Laren, who delivered the only opinion, reserved the question whether parole proof of an agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time was competent under the Act. The question reserved by Lord M'Laren was answered in the affirmative by this Division in Drybrough & Co. v. Roy,[3] where it was held competent to prove by parole an agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time. Finally, in Viani & Co. v. Gunn & Co.,[4] this Division went a step further and held that the acceptors of a bill were entitled to prove by parole a verbal agreement that they were in no event to be liable to the holders. It was impossible to distinguish the present case from Viani.[4] It was said that the defenders' averments were irrelevant for want of specification, but that argument was advanced and rejected in Viani,[4] where the averments were, to say the least, as vague as they were here. The arrangement averred might be vague, but if it de facto was the arrangement, the vagueness of the averments would not make them irrelevant. The pursuers might have been very foolish to enter into such an arrangement, but if they had done so, why should the defenders not be entitled to prove that?

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The defenders' averments were irrelevant for want of sufficient specification. The defenders did not appear to be able to make up their minds as to the precise nature of the agreement which they alleged in defence. As averred on record, the agreement seemed to be that the defenders were not in any event to be liable to the pursuers on the bill,—that was to say, neither the defender Ferguson as drawer, nor the defenders Ferguson & Company as acceptors—and that the pursuers were entitled to payment of the sum in the bill only if and when sufficient working capital was raised—apparently by the Industries Development Company—and out of such capital. In short, the averment came to this, that the only party liable on the bill was the Industries Company, and even that liability was contingent on sufficient working capital being raised. The defenders now in argument stated that the agreement was that their liability on the bill was suspended until it should be seen whether sufficient working capital could be raised—that if sufficient working capital was raised the pursuers would be paid in that way, but that if the attempts to raise the capital were finally abandoned, the defenders' liability to the pursuers would emerge, but as to when these attempts were to be regarded as finally abandoned, and as to the person or persons who were to decide whether the attempts should be abandoned, the defenders' averments, whether on record or at the bar, were entirely vague. Averments so vague and indefinite ought not to be admitted to probation on any construction of the Act. The averments in defence were irrelevant on the further ground that it was not specifically set forth in Stat. 2 that the arrangement averred in Stat. 1 with reference to the original bill for £2500 to which Ferguson & Company were not parties, was continued with reference to the bill for £500 to which Ferguson & Company were parties.* The defenders' averments, therefore, were irrelevant for want of sufficient specification. (2) Whether the agreement averred by the defenders was taken as an agreement under which the defenders' liability was suspended for an indefinite time, or as an agreement under which their liability was negatived absolutely, it was an oral agreement which could not competently be proved by parole evidence. The only decision which supported the defenders' contention was the case of Viani.[1] In the case of the National Bank of Australasia,[2] and in the case of Gibson,[3] the decision was adverse to the admission of parole evidence, although there were dicta in certain of the opinions in the defenders' favour. Drybrough v. Roy[4] was an action by the drawers of a bill against the acceptor, who admitted that the acceptance was for value, but averred a verbal agreement under which the bill was to be renewable for a definite period of years. Drybrough v. Roy,[4] therefore, merely decided that, as between the acceptor and the drawer, it was competent to prove such an oral agreement by parole evidence, and the pursuers did not dispute that questions of liability as between the acceptor and the drawer of a bill might be decided by parole evidence. It was difficult to distinguish the present case from Viani,[1] although Viani[1] professed merely to follow Drybrough.[4] Viani[1] ought to be reconsidered.

LORD KYLLACHY.—Some of the cases on this subject have gone very far, but in this case we are asked to go further than has ever yet been proposed. We are asked to send to proof an averment of a mere verbal agreement to the effect that under a certain bill, expressed in the usual terms, no liability of any kind should arise, until "sufficient" working capital should be raised by certain limited companies. It is not said what was the amount of the working capital which was to be raised, or to be held sufficient; nor, as regards the time within which it was to be raised, is there any mention of limit. For all that appears the time might be the Greek Kalends. Now, that is not, in my opinion, a kind of averment which could have been remitted to probation by writ or oath under the old law, or which in any view of the meaning of the 100th section of the Bill of Exchange Act can be remitted to proof now.

* Stat. 2 was amended in the course of the hearing with the view of meeting this objection. Stat. 2 as set forth in the text of this report is as amended. The defenders did not make any amendment except in Stat. 2.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THIS was a case stated on appeal from a determination of one of the Sheriffs-substitute (Fyfe) at Glasgow in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Mrs Sarah Jane Lennon or Herd and others, the widow and children of the deceased William Herd, claimants and appellants, and James Summers, glass-merchant, Glasgow, and R. & W. Cuthbertson, wool and cotton-waste merchants, Glasgow, and Robert Cuthbertson, the only known partner of that firm, respondents, in which application was made by the claimants for a decree against the respondents "ordaining them, jointly and severally, or severally, or in such proportions between them as to the Court should seem just," to pay a certain sum to the claimants.

The case set forth that the deceased William Herd was employed as a painter and glazier by the respondent James Summers. "3. That on 29th August 1904 the deceased William Herd, in the ordinary course of his employment with the respondent James Summers, was engaged" in putting in panes of glass in the sky-light windows on the roof of the premises of the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson, and that while proceeding with said work he was "thrown to the ground from a scaffold erected on the roof of said premises, and sustained injuries which terminated fatally."

Herd v. Summers.

"4. That said premises constitute a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in which machines driven by steam or other mechanical power are used.

"5. That on said date the respondent James Summers, or the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson and Robert Cuthbertson, or one or other of them, had the occupation of said factory, and were the undertakers thereof.

"6. That the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson and Robert Cuthbertson are the proprietors of said factory, and carry on the works of same.

"7. That the respondent James Summers had on said date the use and occupation of said factory for executing a contract between him and the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson and Robert Cuthbertson, for the repairing of the roof of said factory, that scaffolding was used by them in repairing said roof, and that said factory and the walls thereof are over 30 feet in height."

The Sheriff-substitute "held that, as a party seeking compensation under the said Act must ask it from an undertaker, the applicant before coming into Court must elect his undertaker." He accordingly dismissed the application as incompetent.

The question of law was,—"Is this application in its present form competent?"

At the hearing the respondent James Summers was not represented.

Argued for the appellants;—Where, as in this case, "undertakers" contracted with another person for the execution of work, a workman in the direct employment of the subcontractor had, in the event of an accident occurring in the execution of the work, a claim for compensation, under sec. 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, against the undertakers as if he had been immediately employed by them. Accordingly under sec. 4 both the respondents were "undertakers" in the sense of the Act, and were employing the deceased workman at the same time.[1] In that situation a joint and several liability on the part of both undertakers was contemplated by the Act. In any case, the facts stated in the case shewed clearly that there was a good claim for compensation against the respondent Summers, and that being so, the Sheriff-substitute should not have dismissed the application, but should have allowed it to go on against Summers.[2] An application under this Act was not to be judged by the technical rules of pleading and procedure applicable in the case of an ordinary action at law.[3]

Argued for the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson;—There was no claim under the Act against these respondents. The work which the respondent Summers contracted to do was "merely ancillary or incidental to," and in no way a "part of, or process in," the business of these respondents, so that the claim against these respondents was expressly excluded by sec. 4 of the Act.[4] Even if the case fell under sec. 4, there was no joint and several liability contemplated by that section, and the Sheriff-substitute was right in holding that the claimants must elect against whom they were to make a claim,[1] and in dismissing the application in its present form as incompetent.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a stated case arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The point is whether the Sheriff-substitute was right in dismissing the application as incompetent. The application is made for decree against two separate persons specified, "ordaining them, jointly and severally, or severally, or in such proportions between them as to the Court should seem just," to pay a certain sum to the applicants. The applicants are the widow and family of a deceased man, William Herd, who met his death by falling from a scaffold erected on the roof of the premises of the respondents R. & W. Cuthbertson, he being at the time engaged in repairing these premises. The premises of R. & W. Cuthbertson were a factory. But Herd was not in their employment in the ordinary sense of the word. He was in the employment of the respondent James Summers, who had undertaken to repair the roof of R. & W. Cuthbertson's premises.

The application is directed against R. & W. Cuthbertson and Summers, with the prayer I have quoted. The reason of the Sheriff-substitute for dismissing the application is quite concisely stated by him in a single sentence as follows:—"I held that, as a party seeking compensation under the said Act must ask it from an 'undertaker,' the applicant before coming into Court must elect his undertaker." I am of opinion that the Sheriff was right. It is not every employer who is liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, but only employers who are within the meaning of undertaker as defined in the statute. Although there is a provision in section 4 of the Act dealing with subcontracting, there is no provision in the Act for joint and several liability. That being so, I would have had no hesitation in saying that the Sheriff-substitute was right except for the consideration, which at one time I thought might affect the matter, that as this was a summary procedure by way of arbitration, it might be allowed to proceed against one of the respondents, although it was clear on the face of the pleadings that the applicant had no case against the other respondent. I am satisfied, however, that the Sheriff was right in dismissing the application. This is not the only case that may occur. If the Sheriff had opened the door to persons acting in this way there might be a great deal of unnecessary litigation. It would be mala praxis to have persons convened into Court, leaving it to the Court to determine against which of them a good action lay. A party must determine against whom he has a remedy before he brings his case into Court.

LORD ADAM.—This is a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act arising out of a fatal accident to a workman William Herd. At the time of the accident Herd was in the employment of one of the respondents, Summers, who was engaged in repairing the premises of the other respondents, R. & W. Cuthbertson. By this claim the appellants have brought into Court both Summers and R. & W. Cuthbertson, and ask decree against them "jointly and severally, or severally, or in such proportions between them as to the Court should seem just."

The Sheriff has not applied his mind to the facts of the case, or to the question whether both or either of the respondents are liable. He dismissed the action as incompetent on the ground that an applicant for compensation under the Act must elect his undertaker before coming into Court.

The primary purpose of the Act is—when a workman is killed or injured by accident in an employment to which the Act applies—to make his employer liable to pay compensation to himself or his dependants. There is only one case, so far as I know, where a workman has a claim against anybody else than his direct employer. That is the case dealt with in section 4 of the Act. The effect of that section appears to me to be that, when in an employment to which the Act applies, the undertakers, as defined by the Act, contract for the execution of any work, and an accident occurs in the execution of the work, which gives the workman a claim to compensation against his employers, it also gives him a claim against the undertakers as if he had been immediately employed by them. It, however, in no way interferes with his claim against his direct employer. It only gives him a right to claim his compensation from a second party if he so pleases.

I see nothing, accordingly, in this section, nor indeed in any part of the Act which can give rise to a claim of joint or several liability; and as regards several liability it is clear to me that the workman cannot get decree for the same compensation both against his direct employers and against the undertakers. I think he must elect to proceed against one or other. It is true that if he elects to proceed against the undertakers they may have a right of relief against the employer, as is shewn by the cases of Cooper & Crane v. Wright[1] and Topping v. Rhind,[2] but that is a matter with which the workman has no concern. The Act has put the undertakers in the same position as regards the workman as if they had been his direct employers, and I think the Sheriff was right in holding that the workman is bound to elect whether he will seek to recover the compensation due to him from them or from his employer.

Accordingly I think the appeal should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is quite clear that there can be no claim against Messrs R. & W. Cuthbertson, whose premises were in course of repair. There is not the shadow of an argument for preferring such a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The language of the 4th section, which excludes work merely ancillary or incidental to the trade or business carried on by the undertaker, would of itself be sufficient to render a claim against them incompetent.

I must confess that my first impression was that the claim against Cuthbertson might be dismissed, leaving the claim against Summers to be determined by the arbitrator, but on consideration I concur most fully in the views expressed by the Lord President and by Lord Adam. For I am of opinion that there can be no case of joint and several liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

On a careful reading of section 4 I think that where a workman proceeds against the undertaker in the sense of the Act instead of proceeding against his own employer, it results that the undertaker shall have relief against the other party liable. Now, if the workmen were allowed to proceed against both parties, and to get a decree against both, what would become of the right of relief?

It seems to me that it would be very inadvisable and embarrassing to allow duplicate claims of this kind to go before an arbiter.

While I think that if this were an ordinary action concluding against two defenders jointly and severally, or severally, there might be ground for separating the claims, it appears to me that in the present case such a proceeding would be at variance with a fundamental principle of the Act—that a workman must proceed either against the undertaker or against his own employer, but not against both.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the Sheriff-substitute has put his decision on the right grounds.

I agree with all your Lordships that no joint and several liability is contemplated by the Act. Apart from the provision as to subcontracting, with which we are not concerned at present, the only person liable is the employer, who is the undertaker in the sense of the Act.

That would be a sufficient reason for dismissing a claim based on an averment of joint and several liability. In the present case, however, there did arise a question whether it would not be more convenient to separate the claims against the two defenders, and to dismiss the one which seems plainly unfounded, and to entertain the other and dispose of it on its merits, but I agree that it would be extremely inexpedient to take that course, because the probable effect would be to complicate instead of to simplify the procedure in the Court of the arbitrator.

There is nothing in the Act to relieve a workman or his dependants of the obligation to aver a relevant case against the person whom they bring into Court.

The Sheriff-substitute says that the party claiming compensation must seek it from the undertaker in the sense of the statute, and that he must before coming into Court make up his mind who that undertaker is, and bring his claim against the person whom he maintains to be liable. I agree with the Sheriff, and am not disposed to countenance the notion that a workman may call two or more persons into Court on the allegation that one or other of them, but he cannot say which of them, may be the undertaker in the sense of the statute.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, affirmed the determination of the arbiter, and remitted to him to proceed as might be just.

Sale—Sale of Moveables—Pictures—Warranty—Disconformity to Contract—Rejection—Rejection not timeous—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), secs. 11 (2) and 35.—The purchaser of four pictures sold, delivered, and paid for in January and February 1901, continued to possess them without making any complaint until July 1902. Doubts having then for the first time been suggested to him as to the genuineness of the pictures, he took the advice of experts. In consequence of the opinions received he intimated rejection of the pictures, and in October 1902 brought an action for repayment of the price, alleging a warranty of the pictures as the works of certain artists. For the purposes of the action it was ultimately admitted that they were not the works of these artists.

Held that, even assuming the pictures to have been warranted as alleged, the buyer's rejection of them was not timeous, and that he was barred from maintaining the action.

Sale—Sale of Moveables—Warranty—Proof of Warranty—Pictures—Receipt.—The seller of pictures granted receipts for the price in which the pictures were described as "by" certain artists named.

Opinions that these receipts by themselves did not prove a warranty that the pictures were the works of these artists.

Observations as to the proof of such a warranty in a sale of pictures.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 13th January 1901 David Shirlaw, surgeon-dentist, Glasgow, sold two pictures at the price of £235 for the one and £50 for the other, to William Hyslop, coalmaster, residing at Bank House, near Cumnock. For the price of these pictures Shirlaw granted a receipt in these terms:—"Received from William Hyslop, Esquire, Bank House, New Cumnock, Ayrshire, the sum of £285 by cheque for two pictures by John Phillip, R.A., and Thos. Gainsborough, R.A."

In February 1901 Shirlaw sold two other pictures to Hyslop, along with a third one as to which no question arose, at the price of £172. For the price of these pictures Shirlaw granted a receipt in these terms:—"Received from Wm. Hyslop, Esq., New Cumnock, One hundred and seventy-two pds. (£172) for three (3) oil paintings one by E. Verbockhoeven (dated), one by H. Tenkate, and another signed V.C."

All the four pictures were seen by Hyslop before he purchased them. They were delivered to him, and hung up by him in his house. He continued to possess them without making any complaint from the dates when he purchased them until the month of July 1902, when he intimated that some friends of his who professed to know about pictures had expressed doubts as to their being genuine. He thereafter demanded that Shirlaw should refund the sums paid for them, but this Shirlaw refused to do.

Hyslop then, in October 1902, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Shirlaw, in which he craved decree for repayment of the sums paid by him for the pictures which he had bought from the defender.

The pursuer averred that the defender had warranted the two pictures sold in January 1901 as the genuine works of John Phillip, R.A. (the £235 picture), and Thomas Gainsborough, R.A. (the £50 picture).

The pursuer also averred that the defender warranted the two pictures sold in February 1901 as the genuine works of E. Verbockhoeven and H. Tenkate respectively.

The defender denied that he had warranted any of the pictures as averred by the pursuer.

The pursuer also averred that in July 1902 he was "instructed" and now believed that the pictures in question were not the works of the artists mentioned, and were practically worthless, and that when this "came to his knowledge" he intimated it to the defender, and called upon him to refund the price.

The defender denied the pursuer's averments as to the pictures not being the works of the artists mentioned.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having sold to the pursuer the four pictures condescended on, and warranted same as the genuine works of the artists named, and such pictures being spurious, the pursuer is entitled to repayment of the price paid, with interest thereon, and expenses as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender not having warranted said pictures or made any representation regarding said pictures equivalent to warranty, he ought to be assoilzied. (3) The pursuer having accepted delivery and paid price and retained said pictures for upwards of eighteen months after said sales, he is barred from maintaining the present action.*

It was not alleged that any new facts with regard to the history of the pictures had come to the pursuer's knowledge since he bought them, and it ultimately appeared that his later views with regard to their genuineness were purely the result of expert opinions offered to and obtained by him in and after July 1902.

The Sheriff (Strachan) repelled the defender's third plea, and allowed a proof, and the Sheriff (Guthrie) adhered.

A proof was led, but at the request of parties it was confined at first to the question of warranty. The Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) held, upon the proof, that the defender had warranted the Verbockhoeven, and allowed a proof as to its genuineness.

On appeal it was not maintained that the Verbockhoeven was the work of that artist, and the Sheriff (Guthrie) found that the defender warranted the four pictures sold to the pursuer to be the works of John Phillip, R.A., Thomas Gainsborough, R.A., E. Verbockhoeven, and H. Tenkate, and decree was granted for £150 as the price of the Verbockhoeven.

Proof having then been allowed as to the genuineness of the alleged Phillip, Gainsborough, and Tenkate, the defender, while stating that he adhered to his opinion with regard to the genuine-

* The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), enacts:—Sec. 11 (2). "In Scotland failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract, which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages."

Sec. 35. "The buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods . . . when the goods have been delivered to him, and he does any act in relation to them which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or when after the lapse of a reasonable time he retains the goods without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them."

ness of the three pictures last mentioned, lodged a minute by which, for the purposes of this action and to avoid the expenses of proof, he agreed to the case being disposed of upon the footing that the three last-mentioned pictures were not painted by Phillip, Gainsborough, and Tenkate, quoad ultra reserving all pleas competent to him.

The Sheriff-substitute (M. G. Davidson) thereupon, in respect of the defender's minute, by interlocutor, dated 18th January 1905, found that the three pictures specified were not genuine, and decerned against the defender for payment to the pursuer of (1) £285, and (2) £22, being £172 less £150 already decerned for as the price of the "Verbockhoeven" picture.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) Warranty, or representation amounting to warranty, was not proved.[1] (2) But even assuming that warranty was proved the rejection was too late. The pursuer had not rejected the pictures within a reasonable time.[2] In the case of specific articles seen before sale rejection must be immediate. A reasonable time meant a reasonable time for the examination of the goods. If after reasonable time and opportunity for examination the buyer did not reject, he was held to have departed from his right to do so.[3] This was not a latent defect. It could have been just as easily discovered at the date of delivery as eighteen months after. The pursuer was bound to satisfy himself as soon as possible. It was not enough that he did not discover the defect, because if he did not satisfy himself he could have done so. There must be some time within which the purchaser is bound to make his examination. Having hung the pictures on his walls the pursuer had done something inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, and was consequently thereafter barred from rejecting.[4] In the case of Carter,[5] it was held that reliance on the warranty was no excuse for the failure to examine the goods immediately. In the case of Power v. Barham[6] there was no decision upon the present point, but, whatever was the law of England, if a purchaser claimed the Scottish remedy of rescission he must reject within a reasonable time as provided by sec. 11 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—(1) Warranty, or representation amounting to warranty, was sufficiently proved.[7] (2) The rejection was timeous. The question of what was a reasonable time depended upon the nature of the thing sold. No person who bought a picture with a warranty immediately after purchase called in experts to decide whether the warranty was satisfied, and he was not bound to do so under pain of losing his right to reject. If the law were as contended by the defender, warranties in such cases would be valueless. The expert investigation would often cost more than the picture. But the law was not so. The purchaser was not bound to institute such an investigation until he was put upon his inquiry by doubts arising. Then he was bound to inquire, or else lose his right to reject. Here whenever doubts arose the pursuer immediately instituted inquiry. No doubt, where a defect was patent on examination, the purchaser was bound to examine at once and to reject immediately, if at all, but the defect here was latent. It was not discoverable by such examination as a purchaser usually made on delivery, or was bound to make then. It was only discoverable by a very small number of specially skilled persons. The delay here caused no injury to the things sold. This case was not analogous to the cases where the defect was discoverable on inspection. The rules as to rejection in such cases did not apply. This case was more like the cases of stolen goods or forged documents.[1] In such cases the time after which rejection must be timeous was the discovery of the defect. The purchaser was entitled to assume that what he had bought was genuine and not a forgery, and that it was not stolen goods. These pictures were practically forgeries. This case was very like the case of Johnston v. Lawrie,[2] where it was held in the case of a violin sold with a warranty as a Stradivarius, which turned out not to be genuine, having been pieced together by the seller from bits of different violins, that the purchaser was entitled to reject it eight years after the sale. In Power v. Barham[3] the pictures were kept for three years. The principles of Patterson v. Landsberg & Son[4] applied here. If there was a duty in such cases to investigate immediately on pain of losing the right to reject it made no difference whether the seller was guilty of fraud or not.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a somewhat perplexing case, relating as it does to the genuineness of works of art, and the dispute not being a trade dispute, but one between friends who have had picture transactions. The pursuer maintains that he is entitled to recover certain sums paid by him to the defender in respect of the purchase of two sets of pictures, on the ground that they were warranted as being the genuine work of the artists whose names were attached to them in the carrying out of the transactions. The defender denies that any warranty was given, and pleads further that, even if a warranty were given, there was no rescission of the contract within "a reasonable time," and that therefore under the Sale of Goods Act the pursuer's case must fail.

It is necessary to distinguish between the two transactions, and I shall therefore speak of them separately. The first related to two pictures, which for convenience I shall call by the names which were used in speaking of
